[111] Justice O'Connor, a swing vote on the Court, has suggested in the context of a Title VII reverse discrimination case that overwhelming numbers are required. At the Santa Clara County Transportation Agency, only 12 of 124 technicians, no skilled craft workers, and 1 of 110 road maintenance workers were women. Justice O'Connor deemed the severe statistical disparities sufficient to establish a violation of the equal protection clause, thus permitting the Agency to voluntarily adopt an affirmative action plan. Johnson v. Transportation Agency, 107 S. Ct. 1442, 1462-63 (1987) (O'Connor, J., concurring). The Johnson majority disagreed with Justice O'Connor, stating that they would only require a showing of "manifest imbalance" before upholding the affirmative action plan. 107 S. Ct. at 1452. It may be inferred, however, that all members of the Court would require more than a "manifest imbalance" in order to support an equal protection claim.

[124] Where the suit involves public universities, legislative action can supplement judicial action. Relief sought in a suit against Berkeley, for example, will be affected by Assembly Concurrent Resolution 70, adopted by the California legislature in September 1987, which called for each U.C. campus to: describe its exact admissions policies in its catalogues, create an advisory committee of community members, and ensure multi-ethnic representation on the academic senate committees governing admissions. Aoki, supra note 102, at 261. The California legislature has no direct control over the U.S. system. CAL. CONST. art. IX, § 9. However, in adopting California Senate Resolution No. 2126 on March 24, 1988, the legislature exercised its oversight and budgetary powers to create a special committee to investigate Asian admissions at Berkeley and U.C. admissions in general. The senate committee's findings are likely to influence any judicial proceedings involving Berkeley.

[125] The conflict will be more effectively resolved in the long run if defendant university participates in drafting the order and shaping the remedies. Parties in Lau v. Nichols jointly appointed a task force comprised of school board members, minority community leaders, and educators to study implementation plans. The San Francisco School Board, defendants in Lau, provided funding to hire experts and design future bilingual education programs in compliance with Title VI regulations. Lau v. Nichols, No. 72-6520 (N.D. Cal. May 1974) (consent decree).

[126] Damages are available in a suit based on the equal protection clause or Title VI itself. However, the Supreme Court has not conclusively determined the nature of the relief available in a suit based on title VI regulations. In Guardians, four Justices agreed that both compensatory and prospective relief would be available for intentional and unintentional discrimination. Guardians Ass'n. v. Civil Serv. Comm'n 463 U.S. 582, 635-39 (1983) (Stevens, J., joined by Brennan and Blackmun, JJ., dissenting); id. at 625-34 (Marshall, J., dissenting). Justice White, joined by Justice Rehnquist, asserted that compensatory or "make whole" remedies would not be appropriate without a showing of discriminatory intent. Id. at 596 (opinion of White, J.). The crucial vote, Justice O'Connor, disagreed with "the limitations that Justice White's opinion would place on the scope of equitable relief available to private litigants suing under Title VI," but since she concluded that Title VI required proof of intentional discrimination, she did not discuss the availability of monetary relief. Id. at 612 & n.1 (O'Connor, J., concurring). Three circuits have suggested, when discussing § 504 of the Rehabilitation Act, that only prospective relief is available in a suit filed under Title VI regulations. See Manecke v. [128] Benchmarks can be used for both positive and negative purposes. If the court finds at trial the benchmarks have been used to impose a quota or ceiling on Asians, such uses should be eliminated, but progressive uses may still be permitted.

[129] This remedy may not only be appropriate at universities with a higher than threshold percentage of Asian applicants, a figure to be determined by the court. The Asian recruitment coordinator position should be filled by someone with an understanding of Asian cultural norms and familial backgrounds.

BROWN UNIVERSITY,
Providence, RI, November 30, 1988.

STATEMENT ON ASIAN-AMERICAN ADMISSIONS BY ERIC WIDMER, DEAN OF ADMISSION AND FINANCIAL AID

At Brown, the question of how we managed the admission of Asian-American students came up most pointedly two years ago, when the number of Asian-American applicants increased over the previous year by almost a hundred, but the selection percentage decreased by two percentage points and the matriculation percentage also declined, so that we ended up with 17 fewer Asian-Americans in the Class of 1990 than we had in the Class of 1989. To Asian-American students at Brown at the time, this suggested the chilling possibility that Asian-American applicants were being discriminated against. Since then, discussion at Brown (and elsewhere, I imagine) has centered upon the following questions.

1. Do we discriminate against Asian-American applicants for admission on any illegal basis? (Obviously those candidates who are denied by Brown feel discriminated against, but no one questions our institutional right to deny five students for every one whom we admit).

2. In deciding for or against an Asian-American applicant, we are consciously or not, applying any stereotypical considerations?

3. Are Asian-American applicants competing against each other because the majority of them appear to be in the pre-med applicant group?

4. Is it fair to expect that the numbers of admitted Asian-American students will go up as their application numbers rise?

5. Is it appropriate to apply the all-college admit grade (which at Brown is 20 percent) as a standard for the selection percentage of any sub-group within the total applicant pool?

6. Finally, if all these questions are resolved satisfactorily, there still remains this one: by the various ways that colleges and universities in this country define everything from their overall enrollment goals to the generalized characteristics of the students whom they aspire to admit, is any law being broken? Are any invidious distinctions being made? Is unfair discrimination occurring?

At Brown, the number of Asian-American applicants declined somewhat this past year. The selection percentage was one point off of the all-college admit-rate, up four percentage points from two years ago. We have 134 Asian-American freshman as a result, the largest number yet, or 9.6 percent of the freshman class. Because the questions listed above are always under active discussion, I expect that if the number of applications from Asian-American students goes up, and if the quality of the Asian-American applicant pool remains constant, we would see an increase in the number of matriculating Asian-American students at Brown. And given our attention to these questions, that might well be the case even if applications do not increase.

EQUALITY AND JUSTICE IN HIGHER EDUCATION, HENRY DER, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR, CHINESE FOR AFFIRMATIVE ACTION, BEFORE ASIAN AND PACIFIC AMERICAN ISSUES SEMINAR, UNITED STATES SENATE, WASHINGTON, DC, NOVEMBER 28, 1988

Minorities and women recognize that access to higher education is a critical factor in the struggle to achieve equality in American society. As the cost to attend a private college has gone beyond the economic reach of many qualified students, admission as a freshman student to a public university has become an economic necessity for many high school graduates, especially low-income persons.

With the passage of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, institutions of higher learning which receive federal funding have the responsibility to provide equal educational opportunities on a non-discriminatory basis without regard to race, ethnicity, or sex. The California State Legislative enacted Assembly Concurrent Resolution 151 in 1974 to prod the University of California to recruit and admit underrepresented minority high school graduates (blacks, Hispanics, and American Indians) as freshman students. Since then, the University of California has implemented a student affirmative action program to include underrepresented minority students so that members of the black, Hispanic and American Indian communities will achieve a higher education experience and skills to be leaders in their respective communities and society as a whole.

California's Master Plan for Higher Education calls for the University of California to serve the top one-eighth of the state's high school graduates. To be eligible for the UC, high school students must meet a subject requirement (1 year of history, 4 years of English, 3 years of mathematics, 1 year of laboratory science, 2 years of foreign language, 4 years of college preparatory electives), a scholarship requirement of 3.3 grade point average, and an examination requirement.

Among all racial/ethnic groups including whites, Asian American high school seniors have achieved the highest eligibility rate for freshman admission at the University of California. According to the California Postsecondary Education Commission, 32.8 percent of all 1986 Asian American public high school graduates were eligible for admission to the University of California; whites, 15.8 percent; blacks, 4.5 percent; Hispanics, 5.0 percent. Between 1983 and 1986, Asian American high school graduates achieved the highest percentage point gain in UC-eligibility. In 1983, 26 percent of Asian American high school graduates were UC-eligible. During this same period, blacks achieved a 0.9 percent percentage point gain. For Hispanics and whites, their respective eligibility rate stayed the same between 1983 and 1986.

In 1984, 8.9 percent of all high school graduates were Asian Americans. Because of their high UC-eligibility rate, Asian Americans high school graduates then constituted 17.3 percent of all UC-eligible high school seniors, or 5,373 out of a total of 31,455 UC eligibles. By 1987, Asian Americans grew impressively to 24.3 percent of all UC-eligible high school graduates, or 8,268 out of a total of 34,087 UC-eligibles. (During this same period, the number of UC-eligible white high school dropped from 22,890 in 1984 to 22,500 in 1987.)

Because UC-eligible Asian American high school seniors have applied for freshman admission to UC in significant numbers, the University of California has never included Asian Americans in its student affirmative action programs. Asian American high school seniors must compete with their white counterparts for the non-protected, regularly-admissible freshman enrollment slots.

There are eight undergraduate campuses within the University of California system; Berkeley, UCLA, San Diego, Santa Barbara, Santa Cruz, Irvine, Riverside and Davis. Campuses like Berkeley and UCLA have attracted historically some of the most competitive academic students who also qualify easily for admission to the Ivy League schools and other national universities and colleges. UC Berkeley's outstanding record of 12 Nobel laureates, 782 Guggenheim fellows, 51 National Science Foundation Presidential Young Investigators, and being the greatest producer of college students who go on to achieve doctorates commands the respect and interest of the most competitive of UC-eligible applicants.

Situated in a region where there is a large concentration of Asian Americans, UC Berkeley represents access to quality higher education for many low-income, immigrant Asian American students. Because of economic necessity, it is not uncommon for Bay Area Asian American students to commute daily to the UC Berkeley campus.

Prior to the 1980's, each of the eight UC undergraduate campuses could accommodate generally all non-protected and underrepresented applicants in its freshman class. Between 1985 and 1987 though, freshman applicants doubled at selective UC campuses like Berkeley and UCLA. In spite of the increased demand for freshman admissions, both Berkeley and UCLA have not expanded the size of their respective freshman class. Consequently, Berkeley and UCLA have instituted the use of subjective criteria to screen in/out Asian American and white applicants for the competitive, regularly admissible slots while maintaining their affirmative action programs to include underrepresented minority students.

Underrepresented minority communities believe rightfully that the University of California has not done enough to recruit and admit black, Hispanic and American Indian students. Once admitted as freshmen, underrepresented minority students strongly believe that the University of California has been negligent in not providing adequate retention and other supportive services for successful attainment of a baccalaureate degree.

Asian American applicants fear the institutionalization of admission quotas at the selective UC campuses and the use of subjective criteria in freshman admission decisions. UC Berkeley selects only 40 percent of its freshman admittees based solely on grades and test scores. (Please refer to the chronology listed below of the struggle of the Asian American Task Force on UC Admissions to oppose freshman admission quotas against Asian American applicants.)

Numerous white families have expressed both fear and anger to the UC President's Office about the declining enrollment of white students at the selective, competitive UC campuses. These families have raised objections about UC's affirmative action programs for underrepresented students. Many families also believe wrongfully that Asian American applicants are benefitting from UC's affirmative action program.

The total number of freshman admission opportunities is finite. This UC freshman admission dilemma raises numerous public policy questions and considerations:

How does society parcel out limited, "prized" opportunities to population groups that have distinctly different needs and histories?

What does "equality in higher education" mean for underrepresented group members? For Asian American and white students who compete against each other for regularly-admissible freshman enrollment slots?

As the Master Plan for Higher Education calls for the University of California to serve the top one-eighth of the State's high school graduates, what should be the numerical balance between underrepresented students and those who are admitted on a competitive basis? The number of white athletes and other white students who are guaranteed admission to UC Berkeley equals the number of black students admitted on an affirmative action basis. Should protection or "affirmative action" be extended to white students?

Are grades and test scores (meritocracy) still a viable means to screen in/out competitive students? What role, if any at all, should subjective considerations play in a "traditionally meritocratic" institution?

The UC Board of Regents has adopted a resolution which calls on each of its eight undergraduate campuses to enroll a student body that, "beyond meeting the University's eligibility requirements, demonstrates high academic achievement or exceptional personal talent, and that encompasses the broad diversity of cultural, racial, geographic socio-economic backgrounds characteristic of California." In order to achieve this desired "diversity," should society distribute these educational opportunities through traditional merit, proportional racial/ethnic representation, a "lottery system" for all eligible applicants and/or a combination of these factors?

As the public student body of a state like California becomes more ethnically and racially diverse and as Asian Americans demonstrate its ability in certain instances to go beyond affirmative action, does the notion of "diversity" become a strategic defense for whites to maintain a minimum level of representation in highly competitive, national universities and colleges?

There are numerous indicators that certain segments of white American society are ill-prepared or maybe unwilling to acknowledge or accept the reality that members of a racial/ethnic minority group(s) have the ability, drive and stamina to compete vigorously for highly-prized opportunities in higher education. Access to higher education has provided traditionally one of the most effective means to gain socio-economic mobility and to attain leadership responsibilities in American society. The strong desire of and work on the part of many Asian American students to be admitted to numerous highly-competitive, national universities and colleges severely test the willingness and commitment of American society to abide by objective standards and qualifications.

For underrepresented minority students, colleges and universities must continue to provide "equal educational opportunities" through necessary student affirmative action programs and strategies. As many go beyond the need for affirmative action assistance, Asian American students challenge institutions of higher learning to establish "equal educational opportunity" as fair, open competition without any discriminatory, subjective impediments to hold constant or suppress the presence of Asian Americans in higher education.

ASIAN AMERICAN STRUGGLE FOR FAIRNESS IN HIGHER EDUCATION: HIGHLIGHTS OF ASIAN AMERICAN TASK FORCE ON UC ADMISSIONS, 1984-88

Fall 1984: Asian American freshman enrollment at University of California at Berkeley experiences a sharp, unexpected decline. Compared to Fall 1983, Asian American freshman enrollment in Fall 1984 drops by 21 percent; in particular, Chinese American freshman enrollment experiences an alarming 28 percent drop; white freshman enrollment declines only 5 percent.

The disproportionate decline in Asian American freshman enrollment contradicts UC Berkeley administration's earlier projections that, throughout the 1980's, Asian American freshman enrollment will increase at a steady rate and will reach easily ⅓ of the undergraduate population by the end of the decade.

Compared to whites and other ethnic/racial groups, Asian American high school graduates have achieved the highest UC eligibility rate. 26 percent of all Asian American public high school graduates in 1983 are eligible for UC freshman admissions; whites, 15.5 percent.

November 1984: Asian American civil rights groups and community representatives form the Asian American Task Force on UC Admissions to investigate, study and monitor the admissions policies and procedures of UC Berkeley. S.F. Municipal Court Judge Lillian Sing and Alameda County Superior Court Judge Ken Kawaichi are co-chairs of the Asian American Task Force. Task Force is very concerned about the institutionalization of subjective criteria in freshman admission considerations for Fall 1985 and subsequent years.

During the next five months, Task Force gathers statistical information about Fall 1984 freshman admittees and analyzes changes in admissions policies. Task Force begins a series of meetings with UC Berkeley officials. Task Force confronts administration officials about the imposition of a minimum 400 score on SAT verbal test to screen out eligible Asian American permanent resident alien applicants. University officials initially deny any such policy existed. Later on, administration officials reveal that there was discussion about imposing a minimum 400 score on SAT verbal test to, but this requirement was never implemented against Asian American applicants.

June 1985: Task Force issues its reports and finds that the sharp decline in Asian American freshman enrollment in Fall 1984 resulted from unilateral, undisclosed changes in freshman admission policies by UC Berkeley admission officials. Specifically, Task Force charges that UC Berkeley admission officials:

Imposed a minimum 400 score on SAT verbal test to deny admission to eligible Asian American immigrant freshman student applicants;

Unexpectedly ceased freshman admission consideration for low-income, first-generation-collegiate Asian American applicants; rejected these eligible Asian applicants and redirected them to other UC campuses; these low-income Asian American students did not enroll in significant numbers at other UC campuses because of the economic barriers in attending a campus far from home;

Did not include Asian American faculty and staff members in the discussion, adoption and implementation of freshman admission policies; did not publicize to affected Asian American applicants changes in freshman admission policies.

July 1985: UC Berkeley officials issue a response to the Task Force Report and disputes the findings of the Task Force. UC Berkeley reaffirms its "strong commitment to serving Asian students and encouraging their participation in higher education."

1986: National, state and local press discuss the allegations of the Asian American Task Force.

December 1986: In an interview with San Diego newspapers, UC President David Gardner cites how the enrollment of Asian Americans at UC and other racial imbalances are causing unrest among some groups, including whites who are experiencing a decline in representation. President Gardner suggests that the State Legislature should reconsider state legislation enacted in 1974 which called for UC undergraduate enrollment to reflect the racial and ethnic makeup of graduating high school seniors in California.

January 1987: UC Berkley Office of Vice-Chancellor for Undergraduate Affairs releases its own report about its admission policies and practices in response to growing Asian American community concerns about freshman admissions quotas. This report states that UC Berkeley does not set quotas against Asian American applicants.

The report further suggests that the grades and test scores of Asian American admittees are not as high as those of white admittees, Asian American freshman applicant flow interest is not evenly distributed among the 5 colleges of UC Berkeley; a disproportionate number of Asian American want to study engineering and chemistry, but there is insufficient space to accommodate all interested applicants; Asian American applicants should consider studying at the other 7 UC undergraduate campuses.

March 1987: Asian American Task Force meets with UC President David Gardner to request the inclusion of Asian Americans on all campus and systemwide admissions and enrollment committees; formation of a systemwide committee to review and investigate admissions problems; adoption and implementation of affirmative action plan to include Asian Americans into key campus and systemwide administrative positions; establishment of an on-going dialogue between the Asian American community and UC President's Office to prevent and reduce tensions.

Task Force meets with Assembly Speaker Willie Brown and other state legislators to discuss its concerns about the lack of clearly articulated freshman admission policies and procedures systemwide and by campus. Assembly Speaker Brown supports greater legislative oversight and involvement to resolve controversy over admissions quotas.

Senate Pro Tempore David Roberti requests the State Auditor General to conduct an audit of the UC Berkeley freshman admissions policies and procedures as they affect Asian American and white applicants.

Spring 1987: UC Berkeley Academic Senate appoints Subcommittee on Asian American Freshman Admissions to review the allegations of the Task Force.

September 1987: The State Legislature unanimously adopts ACR 70, authored by Assembly Speaker Brown, which requests UC to review and make improvements in its freshman admissions policies and to submit report of its actions to the State Legislature by March 15, 1988.

UC Chancellor Mike Heyman establishes the Chancellor's Committee on Asian Affairs, co-chaired by Nobel Laureate Professor Yuan Lee and Janice Koyama. Chancellor Heyman invites Task Force Co-Chairs Sing and Kawaichi to serve on the committee. The principal charge of the Committee is to recommend how Asian American students, faculty members and community can be integrated fully into every aspect of campus life.

October 1987: State Auditor General releases his audit of UC Berkeley freshman admissions policies and practices from Fall 1981 to Fall 1987. Auditor General calculates 49 separate rates of freshman admission for Asians and whites among 5 colleges and 2 departments over this seven-year period. The Auditor General finds that, of the 49 Asian admission rates and the 49 white admission rates that were compared, the White rates were higher in 37 instances and the Asian rates were higher in 12 instances.

Further, the Auditor General finds that, from 1981 to 1987, the average high school grade point average (gpa) of Asian applicants rose from 3.20 to 3.72; the average gpa of whites during the same period rose only from 3.27 to 3.62.

The Auditor General cites that the removal of freshman admission consideration for low-income Asian American applicants resulted in a greater number of white athletes admitted. (UC Berkeley officials publicly confirm that admissible, but non-competitive white students were admitted.) The loss of protection for low-income applicants since 1984 has been one of the factors in the persistent disparity in admission rates between Asians and whites.

Auditor General observes that 3 of the 5 colleges at UC Berkeley did not maintain written policies on the implementation of subjective criteria.

UC Berkeley Academic Senate reconstitutes its Subcommittee on Asian American Admissions so as to restore public confidence in the objectivity of its investigations of allegations about freshman admissions quotas.

January 1988: The Assembly Sucommittee on Higher Education releases two internal memos (dated 12/28/83 and 1/4/84) by the Director of Admissions at UC Berkeley establishing a minimum score of 400 on the SAT verbal test for all "permanent resident alien" applicants.

At legislative hearing, UC Berkeley Chancellor Heyman apologizes publicly to the Asian American community for the manner in which UC Berkeley administration officials have handled and responded to the concerns of the Asian American community about freshman admissions quotas. Chancellor Heyman announces the formation of an Admissions Coordination Review Board and pledges to work with the Asian American Task Force to restore public confidence in UC Berkeley admissions policies and procedures.

February 1988: UC Berkeley officials reveal that, in the Fall 1987 College of Letters and Science freshman class, 631 White freshman admittees (out of a total of 2622 white admittees or 24.1%) were given "assured access" without going through traditional meritocratic, academic competiton.

February 1988: Task Force appears before the UC Board of Regents and asks for the adoption of fair, systemwide freshman admissions policies. Task Force points out the urgent need for a systemwide admissions policy based on economic status (instead of race) in regard to low-income, first-generation collegiate applicants.

March 1988: UC presents its Report on ACR 70 to the State Legislature. In meeting with state legislators and UC President Gardner, Task Force voices its objection to the differences in freshman selection criteria from campus to campus.

May 1988: UC Board of Regents revises its policy on Undergraduate Admissions to provide that "the University seeks to enroll, on each of its campuses, a student body that, beyond meeting the University's eligibility requirements, demonstrates high academic achevement or exceptional personal talent, and that encompasses the broad diversity of cultural, racial, geographic, and socio-economic backgrounds characteristic of California."

July 1988: UC President's Office issues Guidelines for Implementation of University Policy on Undergraduate Admissions. These guidelines call for each of the eight undergraduate campuses to select at least 40 percent but not more than 60 percent of freshman admittees on the basis of academic criteria: academic grade point average; test scores (SAT or ACT and College Board Achievement Tests); number and content of high school courses successfully completed in academic subjects beyond the minimum; number of University-approved accelerated/advanced placement/honors courses.

These guidelines further permit each campus to select the remaining 60 percent to 40 percent of the freshman admittees on the basis of supplementary criteria: special talents, interests or experiences beyond the academic criteria; special circumstances adversely affecting one's life experience; ethnic identity, gender, and location of residence.

ASIAN AND PACIFIC AMERICAN ISSUES RELATED TO UNDERGRADUATE ADMISSIONS AT THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

(By Alice C. Cox, Assistant Vice President, Student Academic Services, University of California)

Good afternoon. Before I begin, I want to take this opportunity to thank Senators Simon and Daschle for their invitation to appear as a panelist this afternoon to discuss the very important issue of Asian American concerns regarding admission to higher educational institutions.

How to achieve full and equitable admissions for all qualified students is one of the most complex problems facing many educators today. I would like to begin my comments by briefly describing the University I represent with particular emphasis on what we are seeking to accomplish in our undergraduate admissions policies and procedures.

For many people outside of California, the University of California means Berkeley or UCLA. However, we currently enroll 153,000 students on our eight general campuses. As a land-grant public institution, the University's admission policy is guided by two long standing commitments to all of the citizens of the state: first, to serve the people and the needs of the state, within the framework of a master plan developed for California higher educational institutions, and second, to provide places within the University for all eligible applicants who are California residents.

This in itself is a sensitive balancing act not easily accomplished. To fulfill its commitment, however, the University approaches all it does with the two institutional goals of academic excellence and diversity also in mind.

In meeting its institutional goals, the University weighs a variety of factors during its admissions process. First, we select approximately half of our students strictly on the basis of academic criteria as measured by standardized test scores (such as SAT) and grade point averages, and the other half on these same academic criteria supplemented by factors such as where a student lives, special talents, social or economic hardships, and cultural background.

The major and the campus selected determines the degree of difficulty an applicant encounters in getting admitted. For example, while all UC-eligible students who apply on time to some of our campuses are automatically admitted, at the other extreme, this year the Berkeley campus received 26,000 admissions applications for 6,000 spaces.

The University has been successful in meeting its goal of admitting the best and the brightest—for example, the mean Grade Point Average of this year's entering freshmen class at UCLA is 3.82, and is moving toward its second goal of creating on each of its campuses a student body that is representative of the ethnically rich population of the State. This Fall, Berkeley became the first UC campus where white students are no longer the majority among undergraduates. In fact, in the last ten years enrollment growth for people of color has far outstripped that of whites in the entire University system:

While white enrollments have increased 11 percent during that time, people of color have increased 73 percent.

Asian-Americans and Filipinos, taken together, are increasing their enrollment at a fast pace: their numbers have increased by 162 percent in the last eleven years. Today, one in five (or 20%) of our domestic undergraduates on all of our eight campuses are Asian American or Filipino.

We are proud of our accomplishments and those of our students. This is not to imply, however, that the University's success has come without challenges at the undergraduate level, many of which have been brought to our attention by members of the Asian American community. The most serious of these concerns fall into three general categories:

1. The University's inability to admit each student to his or her first choice of campus or field of study;

2. The failure to inform the public about selection criteria used in the admissions process; and

3. The use of certain selection criteria such as foreign language requirements, which are important components in our admissions selection process, while there are no achievement tests in Asian languages—placing Asian American students at a disadvantage.

First, the inability to provide a space for every applicant at the campus or major of first choice. University faculty and administrators understand that many students have studied diligently in order to pursue a particular major or need to attend a campus which is close to their homes. Their very real and personal disappointment when they are not admitted to the campus or major of choice underscores the University's central problem of finding ways to accommodate the increasing number of students who are both academically eligible and eager to attend, but who must be turned away because of the campus or major they select. The simple truth is that the number of students seeking admission far exceeds the number of spaces available on some of our campuses. We use the word "impacted" to describe campuses or majors where this occurs and places like Berkeley and UCLA are finding that even traditionally less popular majors are becoming impacted and reaching enrollment limits. The University is attempting to meet this challenge by building three new campuses to address its increased admissions demand. But this is a long-term solution and only goes so far in addressing the problem.

Without immediate solutions, it becomes critical for the University to educate potential applicants about their chances for admission, and leads me to the second concern raised by the Asian American community: the need to provide better information upon which high school students can base their decisions.

The University shares the desire of the Asian American community to provide students and their parents with the information needed to make educated and realistic choices in applying to our campuses. The Asian American community has quite properly chastised the University about its dearth of written information regarding the criteria it uses in making admissions decisions for impacted campuses and majors. We appreciate the advice and recently have published the criteria our eight campuses use to admit students where there are more eligible applicants than a program can accommodate. But matching applicants with the most appropriate campuses is a shared responsibility. University policy cannot accomplish this alone. The University, in conjunction with high school counselors and Asian American parents, must help Asian American youth set realistic goals and work with them in building new visions for their future when disappointments occur.

Now, I would like to touch upon the third concern that is shared by the University and our Asian American constituency: fair selection criteria, and in particular our foreign language requirement. Currently, standardized achievement tests for Asian languages do not exist. As Trustee and Vice Chair of the College Entrance Examination Board, I am personally working with the College Board in the development of appropriate examinations so that Asian American students can demonstrate their proficiency in Asian languages. As an interim measure, the University is reviewing its admissions policies and our foreign language requirement to see if alternatives can be used in evaluating applicant records in those cases where students are proficient in a language where no standardized achievement tests exist.

In summary, the University shares similar concerns as those raised not only by Asian American students and parents, but other people of color as well. And the University is working toward solutions:

First, The University is engaged in a long range planning effort which proposes the construction of three new campuses and expansion of existing campuses to help with the demand for more undergraduate spaces.

Second, Through various means, the University is working hard to communicate to students, counselors, and parents its admissions policies and to assure their fairness so that applicants can make informed decisions and will know what their chances for admission to their campus of first choice are realistic.

Third, The University is seeking short-term adjustments to its foreign language requirements and a long-term solution to the lack of Asian language standardized tests to ensure that students proficient in Asian languages are credited with possessing those skills during the selection process.

In closing, let me say that, yes, we could have been more sensitive at times to the real concerns of our many constituents—and here I include other groups as well as Asian Americans. However, over the years, the University has made tremendous strides in opening communication with all interested groups and in providing more understandable and open descriptions of our admissions policies and procedures. Recently, our Board of Regents established formally a "Policy on Undergraduate Admissions," a concise statement of the University's admissions policy and mission. This statement, together with companion implementation guidelines now provides a comprehensive Universitywide framework for admissions. The University also has established numerous task forces and standing committees at the University and campus level with broad representation, including Asian American leaders.

We take pride in the steps we have taken, especially when you view our entire record on providing opportunities for all people of color, including Asian Americans. But we have yet a long way to go in this process.

I am pleased to have had another opportunity in this seminar setting to continue the dialogue regarding our search for solutions to the very real challenges facing higher education today.

STATEMENT OF THE ORGANIZATION OF CHINESE AMERICANS BEFORE THE HONORABLE TOM DASCHLE AND THE HONORABLE PAUL SIMON, HOSTS OF THE ASIAN AND PACIFIC AMERICAN ISSUES SEMINAR, NOVEMBER 30, 1988

The Organization of Chinese Americans (OCA) congratulates Senator Tom Daschle and Senator Paul Simon on hosting today's seminar addressing legal immigration reform and anti-Asian university admissions policies. As a primary sponsor of this event, OCA appreciates the opportunity to participate in this precedent-setting public forum on these two extremely critical issues affecting the Asian and Pacific American community. OCA is a national, non-profit, non-partisan network of concerned Chinese Americans. Since its formation in 1973, OCA has been dedicated to promoting the active participation of Chinese Americans in civic affairs at all levels and securing justice, equal treatment and equal opportunities for Chinese Americans. With 44 chapters and over 7,500 members nationwide, OCA is the only national Chinese American civic organization with headquarters in Washington, D.C. Included in OCA's membership are local, state, and federal-elected officials.

LEGAL IMMIGRATION REFORM

Legal immigration reform policy in the United States will continue to have a great impact on the Asian and Pacific American community into the twentieth-century and beyond. Currently, Asian countries experience and average fifteen-year backlog of immigrants waiting to enter the United States. In the 100th Congress, the defeated Kennedy-Simpson Immigration Reform Bill contained detrimental provisions affecting the Asian and Pacific American community. One of the key proposals of concern to the community was the severe reduction of the fifth preference category of immigrants, never married brothers and sisters of U.S. citizens. OCA will continue to advocate fair immigration policy in the 101st Congress that include the following standards:

No cap on the overall level of immigration.

Family reunification principles embraced.

A point system that does not favor young, educated and English-speaking individuals.

ANTI-ASIAN UNIVERSITY ADMISSIONS POLICIES

Anti-Asian university admissions policies has never before been addressed in the United States Congress. Alleged cases of anti-Asian quotas in universities nationwide have multiplied in the past several years. OCA firmly believes that restrictive quotas based on race, nationality, or ethnicity are legally and morally indefensible and have no place in the admissions process. Affirmative action goals should only be used as a floor, never as a ceiling, in order to promote minority groups enrollment.

To further document the problem, OCA is currently conducting the first national study on undergraduate university Asian and Pacific American admissions policies. This study has been designed to explore the following topics:

Whether colleges and universities have experienced very large increases in Asian and Pacific American enrollments;

Whether Asian and Pacific American undergraduate applicants should have higher admission rates, or are subject to number "ceilings", "quotas", or "enrollment goals";

Whether the admission rate percentage for Asian and Pacific Americans has actually been dropping over the last 10 years; and Whether Asian Pacific American backgrounds are found to be generally deficient in certain characteristics rated as important for admissions.

Upon completion of the study, OCA will make the data available to the Department of Education, the Department of Justice, members of Congress and the general public. OCA encourages the Congress to explore the possibility of a Congressional Inquiry on this serious issue of alleged discrimination in our nation's institutions of higher learning.

Once again OCA applauds Senator Daschle and Senator Simon for initiating this important seminar on Asian and Pacific American issues. This forum has brought the community together to establish dialogue and an agenda for future legislative proposals in the areas of legal immigration reform and anti-Asian university admissions policies. OCA looks forward to continuing to work closely with the United States Congress on crucial public policy issues that impact the lives of Asian and Pacific Americans.

Respectfully Submitted,

MELINDA C. YEE,
Executive Director.

STATEMENT OF THE CHINESE AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR THE ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICANS ISSUE SEMINAR, NOVEMBER 30, 1988

The Chinese American Society would like to thank both Senator Thomas Daschle and Senator Paul Simon and their staffs for providing this seminar today to have Asian Pacific Americans address their concerns on the issues of legal immigration reform and college admissions bias.

On the issue of immigration reform, we believe that fairness and equality to all ethnicity must be the fundamental and guiding principle which can ensure that a dedicated balance among all interests be stricken and that the ultimate goal of reform be achieved. We support the concept of bringing more qualified immigrants to this country through the means of expanding third and sixth preferences, or the "independent immigrants". However, such an expansion shall not be achieved at the expense of immigrants of other categories, or the "family immigrants". In light of the fact that the backbone of this nation's immigration policy has been, and still is, family reunion, if Congress should enact a law, like it almost did in 1988, to eliminate the fifth preference category and to reduce the number of people that can be admitted through other family immigration categories, it would be in effect a reverse back to the dark age of this country's past in which Asians were excluded from immigrating to the United States. Further, in determining who are qualified as independent immigrants, evaluation should be given on the merits of each alien applicant. We do not believe that the current situation warrants the adoption of a single, uniform formula such as the "point" system proposed by some. The administration should be allowed to exercise discretion, under close scrutiny of Congress, to gradually formulating a feasible guideline on this issue. More specifically, we urge Congress to take very cautious steps in considering whether an alien applicant's language skills should be a major factor in the outcome of his or her immigration application.

On the issue of college admissions bias against Asians, we urge Congress and the administration take clear and strong actions against those who are found to be conducting illegal discriminatory practices. We believe that equitable doctrine ought to be applied in each college's admissions process, i.e., let the overall performance of the student be the one and only criterium in the admissions process. Race shall not be a major factor. We further urge Congress to introduce an amendment to the Civil Rights Act by clearly defining the illegality of higher education admissions biases or discriminatory practices. We trust that Congress will strike a dedicated balance between minority's civil rights protection and the problems of so called 'reverse discrimination."

Once again, we appreciate the commitment and efforts made by the two senators to Asian Pacific Americans which make this seminar possible. The Chinese American Society is very honored and proud to be one of the two major sponsoring organizations of today's event. We hope that similar events will be held in the near future so that Congress and its Asian Pacific American constituents can effectively communicate with each other and mutual benefits be brought forth.

STATEMENT BEFORE THE ASIAN AND PACIFIC ISLAND AMERICAN ISSUES SEMINAR, NOVEMBER 30, 1988

(By Rita Takahashi, Washington Representative, National Japanese American Citizens League)

The National Japanese American Citizens League is pleased that Senator Paul Simon and Senator Tom Daschle organized this issues seminar. The focal issues of this seminar—"legal immigration reform" and "anti-Asian bias in university admissions"—are significant, indeed.

The Japanese American Citizens League (JACL) is a non-profit, civil rights organization which was established in 1929. It currently has one hundred and fifteen (115) chapters throughout the United States, and it has twenty-five thousand (25,000) members. As an organization, JACL supports and will continue to support immigration laws which promote equity and diversity. Family reunification measures are fully endorsed by the JACL.

In addition, JACL has been disturbed by the range of discriminatory treatment directed at non-whites generally and at Asian and Pacific Island Americans specifically. The issue of anti-Asian bias in university admissions is one among the many forms in which this discrimination is manifested. JACL has vigorously fought to break these barriers down and to eliminate such discriminatory treatment. It will continue to vigorously oppose any actions which unfairly discriminates.

JACL extends appreciation to Senators Simon and Daschle for their support for and sponsorship of a range of civil rights issues. Among the important civil rights issues, which were raised in the 100th Congress, were: the Civil Rights Restoration Act, the Hate Crimes Bills (one of which was sponsored by Senator Simon), Fair Housing Bill, census bill for an accurate count of Asian and Pacific Islander Americans, Racial Justice Act, and the Civil Liberties Act.

When H.R. 4432—the census bill—passed with overwhelming support, JACL was gratified. However, when President Ronald Reagan pocket vetoed the bill, JACL (along with many other Asian and Pacific Island American individuals and groups) was disappointed. The attached press release addresses the reactions of JACL, as well as the positions of the National Coalition for an Accurate Count of Asian Pacific Americans and the National Organization of Chinese Americans. In this release, the three organizations asked that the U.S. Bureau of the Census keep their promise to use the check-off format.

Civil rights victories were won in the 100th Congress. One victory that JACL and JACL-Legislative Education Committee (JACL-LEC) were particularly involved in for many years, was the Civil Liberties Act. JACL and JACL-LEC were gratified by the overwhelming support for this bill in both houses of Congress. Senators Simon and Daschle—along with the many other senators and representatives—provided strong support for this bill. For this, we are thankful.

Because President Reagan signed H.R. 442 (the Civil Liberties Act) into law on 10 August 1988, the newly-established Public Law 100-383 provides for monetary compensation to the thousands of individuals who were denied their constitutional rights. During World War II, the U.S. Government incarcerated and restricted approximately one hundred and twenty thousand (120,000) persons from the West Coast. Most were incarcerated in concentration camps, solely on the basis of their heritage. All persons of Japanese ancestry, in the United States, were affected by the discriminatory actions taken by the U.S. Government. Redress legislation passed some forty-five years later.

JACL commends the 100th Congress for its progressive moves forward in the area of civil rights. At the same time, JACL anticipates the passage of many other civil rights legislation during the 101st Congress.

ON H.R. 4432—THE CENSUS BILL

Three national organizations—the National Coalition for an Accurate Count of Asian Pacific Americans, the National Japanese American Citizens League, and the National Organization of Chinese Americans—expects the U.S. Department of Commerce's Bureau of the Census to follow through on its promise to use the check-off format to count Asian and Pacific Island Americans during the 1990 decennial census.

We are pleased that the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate passed H.R. 4432—the bill which requires the U.S. Bureau of the Census to use a check-off format to count Asian and Pacific Island Americans. Overwhelming support for this bill (in both houses) conveyed a clear message and a potent mandate to the Census Bureau. Asian and Pacific Island Americans are to be counted through this check-off format.

Prior to final passage of this bill in Congress, the U.S. Bureau of the Census agreed that it would use this format. Not only did the Bureau make this promise to members of Congress, it also announced this point to Asian and Pacific Island American representatives. During a meeting of the U.S. Bureau of the Census' Advisory Committee on Asian and Pacific Islanders, in October, the Census Bureau confirmed that it would use the check-off format.

This resolve was also conveyed to a group of Asian and Pacific Island American representatives, who gathered from throughout the country, on 22 October 1988. At the invitation and expense of the U.S. Census Bureau, these individuals met to provide input to the Bureau. It was at this meeting that the Census Bureau showed the group an example the form which included the check-off format. Clearly, this format was shown to be reasonable and appropriate, and definitely feasible.

Should they to retract their promise to Congressional leaders and to the Asian and Pacific Island community, the U.S. Bureau of the Census will realize the long-term negative implications for years. This slap to Congress and insult to the Asian and Pacific Island American community would be difficult to repair because of resulting senses of "no confidence".

We urge the U.S. Bureau of the Census to move forward with its commitments and promises. To do otherwise would be unconscionable and objectionable.

NATIONAL COALITION FOR AN ACCURATE COUNT OF ASIAN PACIFIC AMERICANS,
San Francisco, CA, November 16, 1988.

Re: Fulfilling Promises to Federal Legislators and Asian Pacific American Communities—1990 Race Question.

Secretary C. WILLIAM VERITY,
U.S. Department of Commerce, Washington, DC.

MR. JOHN G. KEANE,
Director, U.S. Bureau of Census, U.S. Department of Commerce, Washington, DC.

DEAR SECRETARY VERITY and MR. KEANE: On behalf of the National Coalition for an Accurate Count of Asian Pacific Americans, comprised of a broad coalition of community and civil rights groups across the country, we are writing to urge you to proceed with previously-announced Census Bureau plans to list nine specific Asian-Pacific Islander racial groups (along with a write-in for all other Asian/Pacific Islander groups) in the 1990 race question.

Notwithstanding the pocket veto of H.R. 4432 by President Reagan, the Census Bureau has an obligation to fulfill promises made to federal legislators and community representatives during the week of October 17 that the Census Bureau has committed itself to list these nine different Asian/Pacific Islander groups in the 1990 race question. As we have testified before the United States Congress and have stated personally to you and your staff numerous times, the specific listing of these nine Asian/Pacific Islander groups will cover approximately 95% of the national Asian Pacific American population. Asian and Pacific Islander citizens should enjoy the same level of ease and simplicity in checking off their respective racial grouping as white, Black, and Hispanic respondents experience in filling out the race and ethnic questions through a check-off system.

When some of us community representatives attended the Bureau's October 22, 1988 meeting on tabulation and publication of racial data, we received a copy of how the Bureau will format the 1990 race question to accommodate the specific listing of the nine Asian/Pacific Islander groups. Contrary to earlier statements made by Census Bureau officials that it was not technically feasible to accommodate the listing of nine specific Asian/Pacific Islander groups in the 1990 race question, the Census Bureau demonstrated unequivocally at this October 22 meeting that the 1990 race question can include the specific listing of these Asian/Pacific Islander groups.

We are very troubled that, upon the pocket veto of H.R. 4432 and when questioned about the Bureau's plans to list specifically the nine Asian/Pacific Islander groups in the 1990 race question, census officials have been less than candid and forthright in publicly re-committing itself to proceed with previously-announced plans to use the 1980 format in the 1990 race question with regard to Asians and Pacific Islanders. Worse yet, it appears that the Census Bureau may be trying to interpret the Memorandum of Disapproval of H.R. 4432 as an executive order mandating the Census Bureau to revert back to the "short race" question which excludes the listing of any Asian or Pacific Islander racial subgroup.

Over six million Asians and Pacific Islanders deserve to be counted accurately and efficiently in the 1990 Census. The National Coalition for an Accurate Count of Asian Pacific Americans urges you to keep your word with the community and members of the U.S. Congress and fulfill your promises to list nine Asian/Pacific Islander groups in the 1990 race question.

Thank you for your attention in this matter.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY DER.

COMMENTS FOLLOWING PRESIDENT REAGAN'S VETO OF H.R. 4432

(By Rita Takahashi)

President Ronald Reagan's refusal to sign H.R. 4432 into law—despite wide-range support from many groups—is stunning. Clearly, Reagan's decision is counter to the position taken by Congress and many individuals and groups comprising the American public.

The message has already been sent that the check-off format is desired in the 1990 decennial census count of Asian and Pacific Island Americans. Apparently, President Reagan decided not to go with the sentiments of the congressional leaders of this country.

Like the impact felt when Reagan recently vetoed the "whistle-blower" legislation (S. 508), Congress and public now feel the sting of another slap.

COMMENTS BY WILLIAM YOSHINO, ACTING NATIONAL JACL DIRECTOR

We are dismayed with the President's veto of H.R. 4432 which would have required the Census Bureau to list the various categories of Asian subgroups on the 1990 Census form.

We urge the Census Bureau to proceed with the format as prescribed in the legislation so as to avoid an undercount of services to the community.

[From the Japanese American Citizens League, Nov. 18, 1988]

REAGAN VETOES BILL REQUIRING CENSUS BUREAU TO TALLY ASIAN AMERICANS GROUPS INDIVIDUALLY

WASHINGTON.—A bill requiring the Census Bureau to tabulate nine different Asian American sub-groups individually was vetoed Nov. 8 by President Reagan. The president's pocket veto of H.R. 4432 was because the bill would "* * * unnecessarily restrict the form of the race question in future censuses. Second, it would require the Census Bureau to use a form of race question that the bureau has tested and found to be less accurate than the one it plans to use in 1990. Third, it would specifically require questions relating to plumbing facilities and heating and cooling equipment in housing units that would not produce data sufficiently useful to justify their inclusion. * * * Finally, these changes would increase administrative costs and add to the paperwork burden imposed on the public by the census."

A disappointed Rep. Robert Matsui (D-Calif.), who introduced the measure, responded by saying, "It's disturbing to see the White House take a negative approach to such a basic measure of fairness and democracy." He also said that the bureau assured him weeks ago that it would carry through with the legislation's intent regardless of the bill's future. "I certainly hope the bureau plans to stand by it's word," he added.

Rep. Norman Mineta (D-Calif.) also reacted to the veto and said, "I am angered that President Reagan has chosen to veto this important piece of legislation. By vetoing H.R. 4432, the president has refused to recognize that the changes proposed by the Census Bureau would have distorted the accuracy of the census, thereby making this legislation an absolute necessity." The House approved its version of the bill on Sept. 26, 1988 and the Senate approved its version on Oct. 18, 1988.

Also dismayed by the veto was JACL Acting National Director Bill Yoshino, who said, "We urge the Census Bureau to proceed with the format as prescribed in the legislation so as to avoid an undercount of services to the community." JACL Washington Representative Rita Takahashi said, "President Ronald Reagan's refusal to sign H.R. 4432 into law, despite wide-range support from many groups, is stunning. The message has already been sent that the check-off format is desired in the 1990 decennial census count of Asian and Pacific Island Americans. Apparently, President Reagan decided not to go with the sentiments of the congressional leaders of this country."

The controversy began when it became known that the Census Bureau intended to use an individual write-in method for counting Asian and Pacific Island Americans. In the 1980 count, individuals checked off boxes of their respective ethnic group. As a result of the Census Bureau's decision, Asian American groups, fearing an undercount and subsequent potential lack of services, organized a campaign to force the Census Bureau to use a counting method similar to the 1980 census.

Despite the president's veto, there are still intentions to have the Census Bureau list the individual subgroups. "Until the forms contain those subgroups, this issue is not over," said Matsui.

ORGANIZATION OF CHINESE AMERICANS, INC.,
Washington, DC., November 9, 1988.

President RONALD REAGAN,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR PRESIDENT REAGAN: On behalf of OCA members and the Asian Pacific American community, we are expressing our deep disappointment in your veto of H.R. 4432, a bill requiring that the 1990 Decennial Census form include a format that will provide for detailed tabulations on Asian Pacific Americans.

The One Hundredth Congress expressed great wisdom and sensitivity in dealing with Asian Pacific Americans on this issue. The needs of the individual communities such as Chinese, Japanese, Filipino, Hawaiian, Samoan, Laotian, Asian Indian, Vietnamese, Korean, etc. vary greatly, and should be recognized as separate and unique groups. In the 1980 Census, the Census Bureau has proposed to lump Asian Pacific Americans into one category, which would seriously affect political representation and the allocation of federal aid.

At public hearings held on 20 October 1988, Census Bureau officials introduced a check-off format, similar to the form used in 1980, that they stated would be used "in response to Congressional legislation." This format is acceptable to the Asian Pacific American community, and we are hopeful that the Census Bureau will use this form for the 1990 Census. If this form is not used, then Asian Pacific Americans will be severely undercounted and not properly recognized by local, state, and federal governments.

Your veto of H.R. 4432 is extremely detrimental to civil rights concerns of the Asian Pacific American community. While we are encouraged by your support of Japanese Redress and the appointments of several Asian Pacific Americans to high level policy-making positions, we are strongly discouraged by your actions on this bill. Regardless of your decision, the Asian Pacific American community will continue to fight for a fair and accurate count and the use of distinct ethnic categories in the 1990 Decennial Census.

Sincerely,

FRANK Y. LIU,
National President.

MARGARET CHAO,
Vice President Public Affairs.

MELINDA C. YEE,
Executive Director.

POSITION OF THE NATIONAL CONGRESS OF VIETNAMESE IN AMERICA [NCVA] REGARDING CERTAIN ANTI-FAMILY IMMIGRATION PROPOSALS IN CONGRESS

The National Congress of Vietnamese in America expresses its disagreement with the numberous legislative proposals in the 100th Congress which would have undermined the position of the family in immigration policy. The proposals, while labelled as 'reform', were implicitly vehicles of racial bias against large areas of the Third World (Asia and Latin America). The NCVA urges all Senators and Representatives to the 101st Congress to reject such proposals.

Of this type of legislation, the proposal which came closest to enactment was S. 2104, the "Kennedy-Simpson" bill. It would have made immediate family members, who are currently exempt from quotas, subject to an overall cap on immigration; reduced the number of visas under the preference most used by Asian-American families; reduced the ability for siblings and unmarried children to follow family members; and would replace family as a basis for immigration policy with labor skill. Other bills with a similar anti-family, anti-Asian-American thrust include H.R. 3143 (Representative Donnelly) and H.R. 3910 (Representative Schumer).

One would like to believe that the prejudice of old is dead, that the "Yellow Peril" mentality of the turn of the century is a relic. As the above-cited legislation reveals, however, the desire to restrict people who are different still lives. Immigration from Asia is tied to the family. Attacking the family, as those proposals do, is an effective weapon against Asian immigration.

Asian-Americans have been increasingly recognized recently for their accomplishments in a wide range of fields, from education and the arts to business. Unfortunately, such recognition also engenders feelings of jealousy and insecurity among some elements. Southeast Asians have encountered severe violence in Massachusetts, Texas, and Louisiana. Incidents of racist violence against Asian-American students were reported at the University of Connecticut. There is a perception in the Asian-American community that quotas are being applied against Asian-Americans in screening applicants for some universities. While all of these practices have historical precedent, they are a shameful precedent which must be overturned. College admission should be based on merit, not quotas.

Thus, such immigration proposals must be resisted as part of a potential trend of anti-Asian bias. The Asian American community does not ask for special favors. In the area of immigration, it simply asks continued acceptance of the recommendation of the U.S. Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy, which reaffirmed family reunification policy, as the cornerstone of our immigration system, and recommended no changes to eligibility under the family preferences.

TO THE MEMBERS OF CONGRESS AND SENATE, WASHINGTON, DC, ON IMMIGRATION POLICY 1988

My name is Susan Au Allen. I am speaking on behalf of the Organization of Chinese American Women (OCAW), the Organization of Pan Asian American Women (Pan Asia), and the U.S. Pan Asian American Chamber of Commerce (USPAACC).

I am also speaking personally as a first generation Asian American, an attorney who practises immigration and nationality law here in Washington. I confront the issues raised by our distinguished panelists this morning on a daily basis.

We support an immigration policy that reflects the family values of all Americans. These values include the reunification of the nuclear family, and economic growth through competitiveness.

Immigrant visas based upon family relationship such as parents, husband, wife, son, daughter, brother and sister have served the American ideal of the united family well. The united family has given our forefathers the support to persevere in times of adversity; it has given us hope in times of despair; it has comforted the discouraged and enabled them to get up, shake off the dust and continue on.

For these reasons, Congress must preserve the existing laws and expand the numerical system to enable Americans and permanent residents to be reunited with their relatives.

America has realized her vast economic potential, because, in large part, of the efforts of immigrants. They supplied much of the labor and technical skills needed to develop the resources of the continent. From the construction of transportation and public utility systems to the mining, iron, steel and manufacturing industries, immigrants performed back-breaking and less desirable work which many Americans were unwilling to perform.

Today, immigrants continue to be the source of the labor we need, not only in jobs Americans do not want, but also in professional, technical and skilled or unskilled occupations for which there is a shortage to meet the needs of American business.

If American business cannot get the labor it needs, it will either close down or move somewhere else such as Latin America, the Carribean and Asia, where labor is readily available. In the end, America will export jobs in the thousands and import goods in the millions.

Our immigration policy must also reflect the economic needs of America. In the time when we have doubts about our global and domestic competitiveness, when we Americans are told that Americans are exporting too many jobs and importing too many goods, and when news about our national trade deficit continues to trouble us, we need an immigration policy that encourages the admission of professionals, skilled or unskilled workers to fill our labor shortage. Thus, a flexible policy based on labor needs and economic consequences will enable American business to bring in workers when they are needed to sustain growth and expansion. As a result, American business need not relocate to other countries where workers are available; and we will not export jobs and opportunities.

It is not a secret that the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) has been criticized for conducting illegal stops, arrests, detentions, and interrogations of persons who they suspect to be aliens unlawfully present in the United States. It is also a long standing policy, procedure, and practice of the INS to detain persons arrested without probable cause, without informing them of the reason for the arrest and refusing to inform them of the conditions of release until twenty-four hours after the arrest.

The employer sanction provision of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 (IRCA) has cloaked INS agents with apparent but much misunderstood authority to intrude into the privacy of persons in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States. I am referring to INS agents conducting searches and seizures without warrants, consent or exigent circumstances on the private homes as well as business premises in their efforts to search out aliens, including persons of Asian descent although such persons are United States citizens and permanent residents.

We believe the time has come for Members of the Congress and Senate to take the leadership role and start an inquiry into the policies, procedures, and practices of the INS and its agents which are clearly in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak before you this morning.

COLLEGE ADMISSION POLICY

To Members of Congress U.S. Senate, Washington, DC, my name is Faith Lee Breen, I am the Vice President for Programs of OCAW and am Associate Professor of Business and Management, and Economics. Our organization is pleased to submit the following statement:

In today's global economy, America needs a highly educated and skilled workforce which can safeguard both our national competitiveness and our national security. Therefore, the Organization of Chinese American Women (OCAW) supports college and university admission policies which are based upon individual merit!

Decisions which are based upon race and fixed quotas are inherently discriminatory and thus compromise America's social values. Although it may be commendable to achieve racial balance and diversity in our prestigious institutions of higher education, it is improper for any institution to put a ceiling on the admission of students who have the academic qualifications, but the wrong racial qualification.

It is wrong to redress ethnic imbalance by denying admission to Asian American students who have succeeded in achieving the standards of academic excellence required for admittance into institutions such as Harvard and The University of California at Berkeley and Los Angeles.

Our universities should not reject a student because of his or her race in favor of another who is less qualified. No applicant should be held to a different standard simply because of his or her race. Although we recognize that our educational system must not create friction between Asian Americans and other minority groups; in America's economic system, competition based on merit is a winner! The same is true for America' educational system!

We understand that the Department of Education has been sensitive and responsive to allegations that certain Ivy League colleges and universities have carried out questionable admission policies including putting caps on the number of Asian American students admitted to their schools. We also understand that although inquiries were initiated to determine the validity of the charges of such policies, the Department of Education has now decided to halt such inquiries. This troubles the Organization of Chinese American Women (OCAW). Because even the perception of a biased admission policy compromises the integrity of our system of higher education, The Organization of Chinese American Women strongly encourages Congress to take the lead in determining the validity of these allegations. And, if discriminatory admission policies are found to exist, that Congress immediately act to stop them.

Finally, we believe that higher education can best serve America by promoting and ensuring academic excellence; an excellence which is based upon individual merit!●

NOMINATION OF TERRENCE E. SAUVAIN TO BE A CAPTAIN IN THE COAST GUARD RESERVE

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, it is with great pride that I rise today to commend to my colleagues the nomination of Terrence E. Sauvain to be a captain in the Coast Guard Reserve.

I am proud to say that Terry is a constituent of mine as a resident of Garrett Park, MD, who has served the Coast Guard Reserve with distinction since 1974. In addition to Terry's record in the Coast Guard Reserve, he has had a noted career as a dedicated public servant. He worked at both the National Institutes of Health and as a budget analyst with the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Since 1973, he has served Senator ROBERT C. BYRD in a variety of positions, including the elected position of Secretary of the Minority in the 97th Congress.

As we begin the 101st Congress, the Senate is fortunate that Senator BYRD has appointed Terry as the deputy staff director of the Senate Appropriations Committee. I look forward to working with him in that capacity and relying on his help as I assume the chair of the HUD-Independent Agencies Subcommittee.

As a member of the Coast Guard Reserve, Terry served in their Baltimore district, located in my hometown, for 9½ years. During this time, he served the Reserve in a variety of positions.

In light of his record of public service, I urge my colleagues to act promptly on Terry's nomination.●

ST. PAUL, MN

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today with great pride to salute a Minnesota city that this week received a great deal of national attention.

St. Paul, MN, the capital city of our great State, was this week acclaimed as one of America's "hot cities" by Newsweek magazine, which listed St. Paul as one of the top 10 cities in the United States.

The positive qualities of life in St. Paul, indeed in all of Minnesota, Mr. President, are numerous, and it is gratifying to see them receive the national attention they deserve.

The availability of jobs and housing, the vibrant cultural community, and the relaxed lifestyle all combine to make St. Paul a marvelous place in which to live.

But perhaps the most important ingredient of St. Paul—as in all of Minnesota—is the greatness of the people. Anyone who has traveled to Minnesota returns home talking about the warmth and kindness of Minnesotans. It is no exaggeration, Mr. President, to say that Minnesotans go through life with smiles on their faces and songs in their hearts, and that in the "star of the north" you will find people whose friendliness is unsurpassed.

Newsweek spoke at great length about St. Paul's rejuvenation in the past few years, and indeed it has been a wonder to behold. New buildings, new parks, and new homes, all the result of planning and prosperity, have sprung up across town. But again, to paraphrase our new President, a city is more than the sum of its possessions, and it is the people of St. Paul that make her truly shine.

To my hundreds of thousands of constituents in St. Paul, I offer congratulations on this week's accolades, and I am confident that Minnesotans across the State share in the pride St. Paul now feels.●

THE PRESIDENTIAL INAUGURATION

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I recently received a letter from a Ralph J. Kliber, a constituent of mine, who came to Washington to attend President Bush's inauguration and related ceremonies. Mr. Kliber's description of his feelings is so straightforward and moving that I thought I would share it with our colleagues. I know that they will appreciate the directness of Mr. Kliber's feelings, and I hope he will understand my making public his letter to me.

I ask that Mr. Kliber's letter be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

FISCHER, FRANKLIN, FORD, SIMON & HOGG,
ATTORNEYS AND COUNSELLORS,
Detroit, MI, January 23, 1989.

Hon. CARL LEVIN,
U.S. Senator, Washington, DC.

YOUR HONOR: Thank you very much for your gracious response to my request for a single ticket for the inauguration ceremonies before the United States Capitol on Friday, January 20, 1989. As a result of your courtesy, I flew to Washington in the morning, attended the ceremonies, observed the parade and returned in the evening.

Perhaps you would be interested in my reaction to the events of the day. A roving reporter asked me from whence I came and why I came to Washington. My response was simple, but direct. I came to the center of democracy to watch the transfer of the head of state in a peaceful and exhilarating manner, without a shot being fired, an insult hurled or a threat made.

The ceremony was impressive. The music was excellent. The hundreds of thousands of attendees were in an orderly and jubilant mood. Thank you again.

Sincerely,

RALPH J. KLIBER[1]

A GREAT MAN

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise to bring to my colleague's attention a great man, Joe Alexander. Joe has been the commissioner of the Minnesota Department of Natural Resources for the last 11 years. He has been my friend for much longer.

In 1967, when I came to State government, Joe was a regional supervisor in the Minnesota DNR, working in the city of Mankato. I met him then to discuss State environmental issues, and he was an adviser when I was exploring a run for Governor before deciding to run for this seat in 1978.

As commissioner he is the protector and manager of Minnesota's most cherished resources: her natural beauty and fish and wildlife. This, as we all know, is not an easy task. And Joe has taken his lumps. But, no matter what the issue, controversy, or pressure, Joe's maintained his unwavering priority of protecting the resource. His commitment to the resource has won him deserved praise from all sides.

On a personal note, Mr. President, I've appreciated Joe over the years, and I'm especially pleased that Joe, a widower, will marry my first environment and natural resources legislative assistant, and Minnesota's first—and best—environmental crusader, Shirley Hunt, on March 4.

Joe's personal courage and integrity and professional expertise make him a valuable role model for those of us in public service. I share Joe's commitment of resource protection and we have worked together on many important Minnesota issues. He is a longtime friend whose leadership I admired. As tribute, I wish to enter the attached article by Ron Schara, published Sunday, January 15, 1989, in the Minneapolis Star-Tribune, into the RECORD for all my colleagues to read:

ALEXANDER IS STILL GAME FOR THE TASK: DECADE HASN'T DIMINISHED DNR COMMISSIONER'S ARDOR

Historically, it ranks as one of the hottest seats in state government, the one Joe Alexander has occupied for nearly 11 years.

I mean, governors might have silly ideas. And legislators might pass silly laws while bureaucrats waste hardearned tax money.

But only the commissioner of the Department of Natural Resources can screw up the huntin' and fishin', the pickin' and bird watchin'. Or mess up progress over little chunks of earth when so many powerful people want it plowed, drained, clearcut, or paved.

If the fish don't bite, blame the DNR commissioner, right?

The job isn't exactly a wilderness trail to retirement. Yet, there he was the other day, Joe Alexander—at age 65, his silver hair a little thinner, his paunch a little bigger, his steel blue eyes a little softer—still sitting where the DNR buck stops.

Remarkable, after all these fishing seasons.

"I think the record is 12 years as commissioner set way back when," Alexander said. "This will be my 11th year in May. I remember thinking if I got the job, I'd like to be commissioner for four years."

Alexander chuckled at his own change of fate.

Although the DNR is never more than a paddle length from controversy, the department appears on a stable course, responding faster to public concerns yet defending its resource responsibilities.

If so, it's the reflection of the man in the hot seat.

Initially passed over for the commissioner's job by newly elected Gov. Rudy Perpich, Alexander got the nod two years later after Perpich saw his choice for commissioner, an Ohioan named William Nye, being hung in effigy by angry northern Minnesotans.

"My job was to get rid of the controversy, the internal turmoil and level off the department, which was unsteady," Alexander said. "Bill Nye was a nice guy, but he didn't belong. He was out of touch with Minnesotans."

It was a mistake Alexander wouldn't repeat.

Alexander remodeled the DNR hierarchy and launched a series of open meetings between DNR and the public, supporters and adversaries.

"We learned to listen, too," Alexander said of his field staff.

Those were the early years of Alexander's influence.

Within two years, the DNR operation was smooth enough that the next governor Republican Al Quie, decided to stay with the commissioner who had been chosen by a Democrat.

A remarkable feat, in politics.

"If I'll take any credit, it's because God gave me the ability to select good people. I learned early to dictate responsibility and let people do their job," Alexander said.

But there is more than modesty to Alexander's long survival.

He was the people's choice. He played tough but fair. If he made a mistake, he wanted on nature's side. And Alexander had enough of a temper to keep the political flacks at bay.

"I've served under two different administrations, and no governor has ever sent me a person and said 'hire 'em.' And that's unusual in this business."

Alexander also harbored resource principles.

"Only once did I think I had to quit. And that was the day I was called into Gov. Quie's office to meet with a group of southwest legislators who wanted the DNR to reverse its policy on public wetlands. They asked the governor to change the policies or fire the commissioner.

"The governor turned to me and said 'What's the answer?' I said we were on the right track, that those wetlands needed to be preserved and if he (Quie) wanted to reverse that policy, he'd have to get a new commissioner, because I wouldn't do it.

"Gov. Quie turned to the legislators and said 'Gentlemen, you have your answer, and I'm busy.' And he walked into his private office."

Alexander smiled, recalling the story and added "Whew."

High stakes politics is a strange game if your conservation roots started as a $300-a-month game warden 31 years ago. Back then, Alexander wanted the state job enough to quit working as a bottling-plant manager and take a 50-percent pay cut to chase poachers and check fishing licenses.

"My only regret is I didn't start working in this field when I was younger," he said.

It hasn't been all looking at sunsets.

Alexander's career in conservation survived his fight with alcoholism, his son's highly publicized involvement with drugs and his wife's long, ultimately fatal bout with cancer. Rose Alexander died last summer.

"I've never tried to keep my alcoholism a secret," he said. "I figure if you're not afraid of being a drunk, why should you be afraid of being sober?"

In a cabinet in Alexander's office are reading materials about alcoholism and its treatment. It's for employees who think they might have a problem. Alexander has an open-door policy and meets privately with every new DNR employee in the St. Paul offices.

Alexander's son, Will, has conquered his drug problems and is studying to be a drug counselor. "He's turned his life around," Alexander said.

And the Commissioner also is contemplating a change.

"Although I'll stay as long as the governor wants, this is my last term," Alexander said.

Over the last decade, Alexander said he has noticed great changes in DNR's operations, such as forestry, fish and wildlife, waters, non-game, and the like.

"I'm seeing a melding of ideas between the disciplines," he said. "I went to review a clearcut operation recently, and the forestry guy was talking fish and wildlife, and the wildlife biologist was talking forestry."

"We used to square off. Biologists vs. enforcement, stuff like that. We're out of that now."

However, in Alexander's view, serious issues remain:

Water: "I've always felt the waters of the state belonged to the people of the state. I think I've gotten more bumps and bruises from public access than any other issue. I'm also extremely worried about poisoned waters. They don't clean up very quickly."

Fishing: "I'm worried about how the fishing, the eating advisories. How do we get that shut off so we're able to eat some fish again. The Department of Health keeps checking water and finding more stuff. There are a lot of fishermen who go catch and release, but there are also people like me who like to catch a few bluegills and eat those little fellows."

Acid Rain: "I worry about it a lot. I've been to governor meetings where other governors from smokestack states cannot take a stand."

Endangered Species: "I think we're in good shape in saving both plants and animals. There's more public acceptance now of not wiping out the timber wolf. I support state control of wolves, but not eradicating."

Waterfowl: "I wish I could feel positive about waterfowl. I think we can keep a huntable population, but the good old days are just that. Too much habitat has been destroyed to bring them back."

And how will Minnesotans remember the man who lasted so long in a field with so many experts?

"I hope they'll look back," he said, "and say it was a good time."●

ANNIVERSARY IN BIG RAPIDS

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, today, February 2, 1989, the people of Big Rapids, MI, will be celebrating 75 years under a council-manager plan. This event has a special significance because the city of Big Rapids was the first in Michigan to adopt this form of government.

Big Rapids has a proud history. It was first settled in 1855 and was named Leonard, MI. However, its name was changed to reflect the dominant presence of the big rapids on the Muskegon River.

Big Rapids is a fine place to live and work. From its early days as a center of white pine lumbering activity to today's diversified contributions to Michigan's economy, it has always attracted people looking for a higher quality of life. It is also a center for education. Ferris State University, established in 1884 by Woodbridge N. Ferris, who later became a Michigan Governor and U.S. Senator, is located in Big Rapids. It remains today a unique technical-professional institution of higher education.

Mr. President, I salute all the residents of Big Rapids on this anniversary. I am only sorry that I am unable to join Mayor Norm Mason, City Commissioners Jack Hendersickson, Jean Waddell, Mark Witbeck and Vicky Rumsey, former mayor, Bob Horan, Jr., and all my friends in Big Rapids at the special meeting of the city commission, but I am pleased that my representative will be there. I look forward to hearing his report on the day's events.●

THE CITY OF BIG RAPIDS CELEBRATES ITS 75TH ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to the city of Big Rapids as it celebrates its 75th anniversary. Big Rapids, located in the heart of Michigan, was founded in 1985 but it was not until 1914 when the city charter was adopted. This year Big Rapids is not only celebrating an anniversary, but also celebrating its success as a community which has excelled in industry, tourism, and education.

Big Rapids, like many other small communities, has served the State of Michigan and its people well. The city has an industrial base which has provided jobs to many out county areas and has managed to attract such companies as Wolverine Worldwide and Michigan Knife, which is now the leading knife manufacturing company in the Nation. Over the years, the community has been able to sustain and expand its industrial base. These, and other industries, have provided a stable economic base which continues to spur expansion, not only in Big Rapids but throughout Mecosta County.

Ferris State University has been, and continues to be, an integral part of Big Rapids. While the school has changed names and expanded its curriculum, the quality of education has remained superior. The university has helped build the educational and cultural foundation on which the city now rests. Ferris State will continue to be an attractive option for students who recognize the importance of higher education and still wish to be part of this closely knit community.

Tourism plays an equally important role in Big Rapids. Every year hundreds of visitors choose this tranquil environment to relax and vacation among the numerous lakes, rivers, and forests surrounding the city. Big Rapids provides its guests with a warm welcome and a memorable stay. With the Muskegon River flowing through the center of the city, it is not uncommon on a hot summer day to see families picnicking along the shores of the river. Others come to swim, canoe, and fish. The scenic Muskegon River continues to be a main attraction for visitors, as well as local residents, during any season of the year.

Big Rapids should be proud of its rich heritage and can look to its next 75 years with both optimism and confidence.●

DIRECTING SENATE LEGAL COUNSEL TO TAKE CERTAIN ACTIONS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator DOLE, I send to the desk a resolution directing the Senate legal counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in the case of American Foreign Service Association, and others, against Steven Garfinkel, and others, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the resolution.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 42) to direct the Senate legal counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in American Foreign Service Association, et al., v. Steven Garfinkel, et al.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the Supreme Court will hear this term an appeal that potentially raises fundamental issues about the constitutional authority of the Congress to legislate on matters relating to national society. The appeal, in the case of American Foreign Service Association versus Garfinkel, is from a judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia holding unconstitutional section 630 of the Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations Act, 1988.

Section 630 was enacted chiefly to eliminate uncertainty in agreements which the executive branch requires employees to sign as a condition for access to classified information. The need for careful and secure treatment of classified information is important within both the Congress and the executive branch. It is also important to assure that procedures for the protection of national security secrets are not used to inhibit the communication of nonclassified information that would illuminate public debate. The Congress's principal objective in enacting section 630 was to eliminate from nondisclosure agreements vague terminology that might restrict the proper dissemination of nonclassified information. Senator GRASSLEY, Senator PRYOR, and our former colleague, Senator Proxmire, led this effort in the Senate.

In invalidating the statute the District Court accepted a contention of the Department of Justice that section 630 abridges the President's powers over national security. The District Court's opinion failed to give due weight to significant powers that are vested by the Constitution in the Congress concerning foreign policy and national security. Fortunately, the Supreme Court need not referee this contest between the Congress and the President because the administration has issued new forms that eliminate the most questionable feature of the agreements which the Congress sought to reform in section 630.

The resolution which the distinguished Republican Leader and I are offering would authorize the Senate Legal Counsel to file a brief amicus curiae in the name of the Senate to suggest to the court that the judgment of the District Court should be vacated as moot. The brief would also suggest that, although controversies about the implementation of these agreements might arise in the future, no concrete dispute exists at this time which requires the Court's adjudication of matters that are generally best left to the process of communication and accommodation between the political branches.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 42) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution (S. Res. 42), with its preamble, reads as follows:

L. No. 100-202, 101 Stat. 1329-391, 1329-432 (1987), extended by Section 619 of the Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government Appropriations Act, 1989, Pub. L. No. 100-440, 102 Stat. 1721, 1756 (1988), have been placed in issue;

Whereas, pursuant to sections 703(c), 706(a), and 713(a) of the Ethics in Government Act of 1978, 2 U.S.C. §§ 288b(c), 288e(a), and 288*l*(a) (1982), the Senate may direct its Counsel to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in any legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Legal Counsel is directed to appear as amicus curiae in the name of the Senate in American Foreign Service Association, et al. v. Steven Garfinkel, et al., to seek relief from the judgment of the district court holding unconstitutional Section 630 of the Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriations Act, 1988.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CONGRESS SHOULD ENCOURAGE USE OF LIVE CLOSED-CIRCUIT TESTIMONY IN CHILD ABUSE CASES

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation that will authorize up to $20 million in Federal funds for States that have laws permitting the use of closed-circuit testimony in child abuse cases. I introduced similar legislation in the 100th Congress. Unfortunately no action was taken on this important initiative during the last Congress.

Child abuse remains a serious problem in this country. All of us in Congress support Federal initiatives to address this problem. In examining the problem of child abuse, I was appalled to learn that, according to the National Institute of Justice, approximately 90 percent of all child abuse cases never get brought to trial. Other statistics verify that the 90 percent figure is a conservative estimate—indeed the American Humane Society reported in 1985 that less than 5 percent of child abuse cases are brought to trial in criminal court.

These disturbing statistics translate into the sad reality that most child abusers go free and, in all too many instances, continue to victimize our children.

There are many legal and practical problems associated with successfully prosecuting a child abuse case. In most instances of child abuse the only witness is the child. If the child was abused, the trauma of that experience could render that child unable to testify in the presence of the person who committed the crime. Evidence shows, Mr. Speaker, that children who have been abused and are then forced to testify in open court can suffer further trauma.

The use of live, closed-circuit testimony is one way to minimize the trauma to abused children without compromising the rights of the accused. At the present time 27 States have laws allowing closed-circuit testimony to be used in child abuse cases. There are two main obstacles preventing the widespread use of closed-circuit testimony: cost and constitutionality.

My bill addresses both these concerns. Under this bill, States with such laws will be allocated a minimum of $50,000, with additional funds being provided based on the population of the State.

These funds could only be used to initiate or expand facilities and training of personnel for the implementation of closed-circuit testimony in child abuse cases. States would distribute the Federal funds to local governments and the grants would be made on a matching basis with the States paying 25 percent of the grant. Eligible States would apply to the Bureau of Justice Assistance for funds under this new program. States receiving Federal funding under this program would be required to submit a yearly report to the Bureau of Justice Assistance summarizing the impact of the activities carried out with the Federal grant. States would also have to file similar yearly reports to Congress.

In researching this issue, one of the most common problems I found with closed-circuit testimony was the cost involved. Although most district attorneys favor the expanded use of closed-circuit testimony, most local governments cannot afford to buy or rent the necessary equipment.

The office of Brooklyn District Attorney, Elizabeth Holtzman conducted a survey regarding the use of closed-circuit testimony in the State of New York. As a part of that survey, 43 district attorneys were asked if they favored making closed-circuit testimony a permanent part of New York law. Forty-two responded affirmatively.

The bottom line is that cost is, and will remain, a key factor in the future expansion of closed-circuit testimony, unless State and local governments receive financial assistance and guidance from the Federal Government.

This brings us to the other main obstacle preventing the expanded use of closed-circuit testimony: constitutionality. Last year in the Coy versus Iowa case, the Supreme Court struck down an Iowa law permitting children who say they are victims of sexual abuse to testify behind screens.

Justice Antonin Scalia, who wrote the ruling, left open the possibility that closed-circuit testimony and other methods to minimize trauma to child victims of sexual abuse would be permitted on a case-by-case basis, under an individualized finding that witnesses need special protection. Scalia noted that "* * * rights conferred by the confrontation clause are not absolute, and may give way to other important interests."

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, in a concurring opinion in Coy versus Iowa, also noted that the strictures of the confrontation clause may give way to the States' compelling interest of protecting child witnesses. Justice O'Connor noted that a defendant's rights under the confrontation clause "* * *" are not absolute but rather may give way in an appropriate case to other competing interests so as to permit the use of certain procedural devices designed to shield a child witness from the trauma of courtroom testimony."

The Coy versus Iowa ruling left the door open for State legislatures to adopt closed-circuit testimony statutes that seek to protect child witneses from trauma on a case-by-case basis. Yet, despite the fact that the Court's ruling left open this possibility, unless strong leadership is exerted by the Federal Government, most States will be reluctant to move aggressively to expand the use of closed-circuit testimony.

My bill will not only provide the cost incentives for States, it will provide incentive for States to adopt reasonable closed-circuit testimony laws that pass constitutional muster.

A key point that should be emphasized is that the Coy versus Iowa ruling struck down the Iowa law because there were no individualized findings that the witnesses in question needed special protection. The Court made an important distinction—one that legal scholars agree would not prejudice the type of closed-circuit testimony outlined in my legislation.

The grant program authorized under my bill applies only to those States that have in effect a law that permits: the live, closed-circuit televising of testimony of children 17 years of age or younger in criminal proceedings for the violation of laws relating to the abuse of children; and that counsel for defendants in such proceedings to be physically present in the room throughout the period during which such children testify.

The expansion of closed-circuit testimony will result in more child abuse cases being brought to trial, which in turn will result in more child abusers being convicted. Given the fact that approximately 90 percent of all child abuse cases never get brought to trial, Congress should do everything it can to encourage States to expand the use of closed-circuit testimony. Most importantly, the expanded use of closed-circuit testimony will protect abused children from suffering any further trauma.

I urge all Members to strongly support this legislation, the full text of which reads as follows:

"(b)(1) Each State which receives funds under subsection (a) in a fiscal year shall distribute among units of local government, or combinations of units of local government, in such State for the purpose specified in section 1402 of this title that portion of such funds which bears the same ratio to the aggregate amount of such funds as the amount of funds expended by all units of local government in the preceding fiscal year for prosecution of child abuse offenses bears to the aggregate amount of funds expended by the State and all units of local government in such State in such preceding fiscal year for prosecution of child abuse offenses.

"(2) Any funds not distributed to units of local government under paragraph (1) shall be available for expenditure by the State involved.

"(3) For purposes of determining the distribution of funds under paragraph (1), the most accurate and complete data available for the fiscal year involved shall be used. If data for such fiscal year are not available, then the most accurate and complete data available for the most recent fiscal year preceding such fiscal year shall be used.

"(c) No funds allocated to a State under subsection (a) or received by a State for distribution under subsection (b) may be distributed by the Director or by the State involved for any use other than a use specified in an approved application.

"(d) If the Director determines, on the basis information available to the Director during any fiscal year, that a portion of the funds allocated to a State for that fiscal year will not be required or that a State will be unable to qualify or receive funds under section 1402 of this title, or that a State chooses not to participate in the program established under such section, then such portion shall be awarded by the Director to units of local government or combinations thereof within such State giving priority to those jurisdictions with greatest need.

The non-Federal portion of the expenditures for such uses shall be paid in cash.

"(b) Not more than 10 percent of a grant made under this part may be used for costs incurred to administer such grant.

"(c)(1) Each State which receives a grant under this title shall keep, and shall require units of local government which receive any part of such grant to keep, such records as the Director may require by rule to facilitate an effective audit.

REAGAN "REVOLUTION" MOST APPARENT IN JUDICIARY

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, although Ronald Reagan is no longer President, the impact of this 8 years in this city will be felt for many years. It's already apparent that this impact will be especially significant in our Federal courts, including the Nation's Highest Court.

Shortly after the highwater mark of civil rights legislation over 20 years ago, the original, stated goal of a color-blind society was perverted into a reference for reverse discrimination, or set-asides favoring specified minorities.

It took the judicial appointments of Ronald Reagan to correct this distortion, and to halt, in particular, the tendency to turn our courts into the machinery of social engineering.

A George Will column, appearing January 29, 1989, in my hometown newspaper, the Glens Falls Post-Star, commends the recent Supreme Court decision limiting reverse discrimination and the restoration of true social equity. It also attacks the assumption that any progress blacks have made has resulted exclusively from the paternal meddling of the Federal Government. Will's column repeats what I have said elsewhere in these pages, that the Presidency of Ronald Reagan actually was a blessing for black Americans.

It is my pleasure to enter the column in the RECORD.

[From the Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star, Jan. 29, 1989]

SET-ASIDE RULING NOT SUFFICIENT

(By George Will)

WASHINGTON.—Like a pebble dropped into a pond, a presidency radiates lingering ripples. Last week's Supreme Court decision sharply limiting reverse discrimination by governments is a ripple from the Reagan administration, which advocated such a ruling.

It does much to roll back the racial spoils system that exists for certain government-favored minorities.

Unfortunately, the ruling only inhibits, not proscribes, reverse discrimination. Government may still allocate shares of wealth to groups—groups, not just individuals—to which government awards the lucrative status of victim.

A Richmond, Va., statute, which resembles hundreds of other nationwide, required prime contractors on city construction projects to subcontract at least 30 percent of the dollar amount of each contract to businesses owned and controlled by these groups (the list was taken from a similar federal statute): blacks, Spanish-speaking, Oriental, Indian, Eskimo or Aleut citizens anywhere in America. This statute, passed by a Richmond city council with a black majority, would enable, say, a Hispanic firm in Houston to receive preference in Richmond, ostensibly to remedy past discrimination in Richmond.

Justice O'Connor, writing for the majority, said, among many other things, that such "set-aside" programs, to be valid, must remedy "identified discrimination," not just respond to "societal" discrimination. Although the ruling will go far toward stopping reverse discrimination, the Court flinched from the correct course. It should have retreated all the way to the high ground of this unassailable principle: Government may allocate benefits on the basis of race only to compensate identified individual victims of the government's own past system of racial classification.

Only Justice Scalia affirms that principle. However, Justice Kennedy, who occupies what some of us think of as the Bork seat, strongly sympathizes with Scalia's position.

Some parts of the Reagan administration came comfortably to terms with set-aside programs. However, the Justice Department and many judicial nominees seem to understand this: The 14th Amendment's guarantee of "equal protection of the laws" expresses the constituting doctrine of all open societies. Rights belong to individuals, not groups, and least of all races.

The Court is gingerly backing out of a swamp. It waded waist-deep into this in 1980 when Chief Justice Burger, writing for the Court, upheld a 1977 set-aside law. It was the first law by which Congress legislated a classification for entitlement to benefits based solely on race.

Using conservative language to rationalize a profoundly anti-conservative position, Burger said that "appropriate deference" toward Congress' power to provide for the "general welfare" required a ruling that reverse discrimination is compatible with the 14th Amendment's equal-protection guarantee. Besides, Burger said that interfering with "experimentation in things social and economic is a grave responsibility."

But surely some areas are now off-limits to what Burger antiseptically called "experimentation." Justice Stewart dissenting in 1980, noted that only twice before had the Court upheld government programs that inflicted injury (as reverse discrimination does to those not on the list of government-favored minorities) on the basis of race. These were the Japanese-American curfew and exclusion cases during the Second World War.

The 1954 desegregation ruling seemed to say that governments cannot classify students racially. But soon, many school districts were under court orders to do precisely that for the purpose of forced busing to achieve "racial balance." Hubert Humphrey, the prime mover of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, denied that quotas or other preferential treatment of any group was required by that law. But "race-conscious" actions soon came.

Perhaps we are slowly zigzagging our way back to Justice John Marshall Harlan's principle, enunciated in a noble dissent from a ruling that segregation was constitutional. He said, "Our Constitution is colorblind."

But what is the caliber of thinking on this subject in George Bush's Washington? Here is a sample.

Lee Atwater, Bush's chairman of the Republican National Committee, says he is optimistic about attracting black voters because: "Affirmative action has worked and there's now a much larger black middle class." His words imply something unsubstantiated, almost certainly false, and surprising coming from a Republican. The implication is that government programs of racial preference are primarily responsible for black progress.

Atwater slights not only the working of a free economy but also, and more importantly, the self-reliance and other virtues of rising blacks. Atwater's unconscious disparagement of black achievement is a predictable residue of reverse discrimination.

COMMEMORATING E.M. GUNDERSON, CHIEF JUSTICE, NEVADA SUPREME COURT

HON. JAMES H. BILBRAY

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BILBRAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor to one of Nevada's most respected and admired leaders, Nevada Supreme Court Chief Justice E.M. "Al" Gunderson. He is retiring after three 6-year terms of distinguished service on the high-court bench, to devote himself to a career teaching law. He is truly deserving of this recognition.

In recent years, the Nevada Supreme Court, under the leadership of Chief Justice Gunderson, has been very diligent in its efforts to serve the citizens of the State. A longstanding supporter of victim's rights, he has made tremendous contributions to the Nevada legal system.

Born in Minneapolis, MN, Justice Gunderson pursued his undergraduate studies at the University of Minnesota and the University of Omaha. He received his juris doctor from Creighton University School of Law with the second highest triennial average. In addition to the usual juris doctor degrees, he was awarded an advanced master of laws in the judicial process degree in 1982 from the University of Virginia and has received doctor of laws degrees from both the University of Pacific, McGeorge School of Law, and California Western School of Law.

He began practicing law in Nevada in 1958. A former instructor of business law at the University of Nevada, he is a member of the Nevada Bar America, American Bar Association, Association of Trial Lawyers of America, American Judicature Society, and numerous bar committees. He was elected to the Nevada Supreme Court in 1970, and served as chief justice from 1975 to 1977. He was re-elected without opposition in 1976 to a second 6-year term serving as chief justice 1981–83 and was reelected to a third term as justice with the highest plurality and popular vote in statewide elections. He is one of only seven Nevada lawyers and judges who have been elected to membership in the American Law Institute.

Justice Gunderson has received numerous professional honors and awards for his commitment and dedication as a lawyer and a judge. Among which are the American Judicature Society prestigious "Herbert Harley Award," a national award recognizing his devotion to improving the justice system in Nevada. The "Lifetime Achievement Award" presented by the Nevada Trial Lawyers Association for 18 years of distinguished service on the Supreme Court. In 1975, the same association honored Justice Gunderson as "Man of the Year" for his "outstanding contribution to the administration of justice and the preservation of freedom" and in 1986 he was awarded "Jurist of the Year." The McGeorge School of Law at the University of Pacific has recognized Justice Gunderson as an honorary alumnus. In 1975, a "Justice E.M. Gunderson Scholarship" was established to be awarded annually to a deserving McGeorge student preparing for practice in Nevada. He was named "Outstanding Nevadan of 1987" by McGeorge Nevada Alumni and Law Students Association. Also, the American Bar Association, through its National Conference of Special Court Judges presented its 1988 Education Award to the chief justice as chairman of the Nevada Judicial Education Council for providing the highest quality judicial education program in the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, Chief Justice E.M. Gunderson's immeasurable service to the State of Nevada has contributed to the high quality of Nevada law. He deserves the praise and appreciation of all Nevadans. His scholarly knowledge and love of law will leave a lasting impression on Nevada as he prepares for his appointment as senior law professor at Southwestern University School of Law. I urge my colleagues to join me today in honoring one of Nevada's most outstanding, influential, and inspirational citizens.

ALASKAN STUDENTS SPEAK OUT ABOUT TONGASS NATIONAL FOREST LEGISLATION

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, some propose legislation which would cost upward of 4,300 jobs in southeast Alaska, and add wilderness almost twice the size of Long Island to a State that already has two-thirds of the Nation's designated wilderness areas. Knowing of the Members' interest in what today's young people think about the issues, I thought some recent letters from Wrangell, AK high school seniors would make interesting reading. Let me add that their views are reflective of the vast majority of residents of southeast Alaska, whose lives would be directly affected by such legislation. Let me also add that I am extremely proud to represent such fine young men and women as Alaska's only Representitive in this body. I insert the letters in the RECORD:

WRANGELL, AK,
January 5, 1989.

Hon. DON YOUNG,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE YOUNG: My name is Marca Knapp, and I have lived in Wrangell, Alaska my whole life. I am writing you in relation to the Tongass National Forest Bill. Now, I know this bill will be coming up for discussion in '89, and it concerns me greatly.

Without the lumber which the Tongass Nat'l Forest provides us, the mill here in town, and other ones around South East—they will go out of business.

The merchants in our community depend on the lumber industry workers for all of their business, and the schools can't run without the children to fill their rooms. And if the lumber industries go out of business the small logging company here in town will not have much reason either.

Please consider voting against this bill, because the lives of many people including my family and friends will have to move and find a life somewhere else.

Sincerely,

MARCA KNAPP.

JANUARY 17, 1988.

Hon. DON YOUNG,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE YOUNG: I feel that the issues that are confronting Alaskan citizens right now are important. There is SO MUCH forest in the Tongass that by the time we were to get done logging one part, a part already logged would be ready to be logged again. The timber industry in Alaska provides so many jobs, that it would be almost suicidal to get rid of it, in part or in whole.

I am not planning a career in timber, but I do plan to return to my home state of Alaska after college and try to pay back some of the great rewards she has given me. It doesn't sound like too good of a place to come back to if one of the major industries gets wiped out.

I would be interested in knowing your views on the Tongass issues, and what you plan to do for Alaska. Thank you for your time and I would appreciate hearing from you.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER MAENHOUT.

Hon. DON YOUNG,
House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE YOUNG: I am writing this letter to tell you my views on the Tongass National Forest Bill. I hear thousands of people want to turn it into a national park. This means that there would be no more logging. This is fine if you live down south and only see it in postcards. But to the people who live in South East Alaska it would be like cutting our throats. I'm not some retired person living in Florida who needs something to complain about. I'm a senior at Wrangell High School. College is coming soon and without the saw mill a lot of people from these small towns will never make it to college. The fishing industry last year was such a flop that some people didn't make enough to pay their union dues. In this town of 3000 people, many people have timber related jobs or depend on the money that those people spend. Without logging this place would be a ghost town in about 1 year. It would take millions of tourist dollars a year to support our shattered economy and that's just not going to happen. If the Sierra Club wants to close us down then they should pay South East Alaska to help its crippled economy.

Thank you for listening to my side of the story.

Sincerely.

RICK KOHRT.

INTRODUCTION OF A RESOLUTION TO DESIGNATE NATIONAL CULINARY WEEK

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a resolution to designate the week of October 15–21, 1989, as, "National Culinary Week." This week will honor not only the culinary profession, but also the American culinary team. The team has been competing on an international level since 1964. The team is sponsored by the American Culinary Federation, and the National Restaurant Association U.S. Culinary Team Foundation. This nonprofit organization finances and promotes the U.S. culinary team.

The National Restaurant Association is the leading trade association for the foodservice industry. The NRA represents all facets of the foodservice industry, including restaurants, cafeterias, clubs, contract foodservice management, drive-ins, caterers, institutions, and other engaged in the preparation of food away from home. While the NRA is well-known for its lobbying efforts in Washington and State legislatures, it also is active in education and research for the foodservice industry. The NRA has 10,000 members across the country.

The American Culinary Federation is a professional, educational, and fraternal organization of chefs and cooks. The federation was founded in 1929 in New York and since that time has grown to over 20,000 members nationwide with nearly 207 chapters. The ACF provides the means for chefs and cooks to receive education, training, and experience in the culinary profession.

Over the years that the United States has been competing in the International Culinary Competition the team has done increasingly well in competition. This is illustrated by the contrast between the 1968 team, which won no medals and the 1984 team, which won gold medals in both the hot and cold food competitions. The 14-member 1988 team prepared for over 2 years for the competition in Germany, and walked away with 35 gold medals. The 1988 entries reflected the growing trend in the United States toward lighter, more healthy foods and featured new creations developed by the team members.

In addition to the culinary competition team, the ACF also provides many educational opportunities to chefs and cooks across the country. First, there is the American Culinary Federation Educational Institute [ACFEI], which recognizes superior culinary schools through an accreditation program. The ACFEI also sponsors the National Apprenticeship Training Program for Cooks, a program recognized by the U.S. Department of Labor. The program consists of a 3-year earn-as-you-learn program combining classroom instruction and employment with a certified chef. Successful completion of the program allows participants the opportunity to enter the culinary field as a certified cook. Presently 84 apprenticeship programs are in operation across the country. A chef certification program is another one of the activities performed by the ACFEI. Certification ranges from certified cook or certified pastry chef to certified executive chef. Through the ACFEI, a chef can be recognized as a certified master chef.

The ACFEI offers financial assistance to qualified culinary students to pursue their education and educational seminars are a large part of the activities at the annual ACF convention, which over 700 members attended last year. The American Academy of Chefs is the honor society of American chefs which is associated with ACF. In addition to the Olympic team sponsored by the ACF, the federation also sponsors many culinary competitions during the year. These competitions are the first experience many chefs have in culinary competition.

The ACF and the NRA are dedicated to the preservation and expansion of the culinary profession in the United States. These organizations have succeeded in allowing American chefs to successfully compete against European chefs. The accomplishments of the American culinary team are commendable. I find the accomplishments to the culinary profession of particular interest, as my parents operated a restaurant in Monterey after their arrival in the United States. I know firsthand the work and dedication needed in the culinary profession. The men and women who make up the American culinary profession deserve to be recognized for their contributions. I urge my colleagues to join me in sponsoring the resolution I am introducing today to designate October 15–21, 1989 as, "National Culinary Week".

A TRIBUTE TO MORRIS BAILEY

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pride and pleasure that I call my colleagues' attention to the accomplishments of Mr. Morris Bailey, the founder and the president of the Sephardic Community Center of Brooklyn.

Morris Bailey has provided visionary leadership in bringing the diverse strands of the Sephardic community together. His community center has provided over 7,000 members between the ages of 2 and 92 with a sanctuary, where skills can be honed and citizenship groomed.

Mr. Bailey is the driving force behind this thriving community center. In the early stages of the center's development, his tireless ability to raise funds provided invaluable revenue which would become the life blood of the 60,000 square foot center. The center opened in 1982 only 5 years after it had been incorporated.

The community center was equipped with every imaginable amenity. Morris Bailey would not be satisfied with anything but the highest quality for his dream of providing a focal point in Brooklyn for the Sephardic community. He provided for the needs of the young and the old. From daybreak until midnight, 6 days a week, Mr. Bailey never lost sight of his burning desire to unify all of the elements of the Sephardic community.

At this juncture in Morris Bailey's distinguished career of service to Brooklyn, it is fair to say that he has created the "Jewel of the Community" in the heart of Brooklyn. The four generations of Bailey family who have shared in Morris' work must be proud of his outstanding achievement. Hillel said: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? If I am only for myself, what am I? If not now, when?" Morris Bailey has taken one giant step, through the execution of his vision, toward answering these proverbial questions.

It is with profound gratitude and admiration that I share with my colleagues the service Morris Bailey has provided the Sephardic community and Brooklyn. With work like his, community will once again become a place where different people come together and create an identity greater than their individual one.

TRIBUTE TO GLENDALE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. THOMAS A. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the people of Glendale on the U.S. Department of Education's recognition of Glendale Elementary School for excellence in education.

This honor is indicative of the ongoing commitment which the people of Glendale have made to the future of their children. Glendale has set an example for other communities to follow in its dedication to the education of our children—those who represent to our best hopes for the future of our communities and our Nation.

I join with the Secretary of Education and all of the friends of Glendale Elementary School in recognizing this outstanding achievement. I am confident that Glendale's tradition of excellence will carry far into the future.

It is the commendable efforts of the teachers, coaches, administration, parents, and students that make a great school. Glendale Elementary is such a school. This is apparent through the sixth-graders' achieving at or above their grade level in mathematics, science, and reading; through the thousands of hours of volunteer work by PTA members; and through the Department of Education's choice of Glendale Elementary School as a recipient in the 1988 National Elementary School Recognition Program.

The importance of elementary schools especially is obvious to ensure students' success in all levels of education. Glendale has shown that it is dedicated to that end.

It is my hope and expectation that Glendale Elementary School as part of the Princeton City School District will continue to deserve high honors for many years to come.

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE RESOLUTION 61

HON. MICKEY EDWARDS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, I made an attempt to permit amendments to the package of rules being proposed by the Democrat majority for the operation of the 101st Congress. As the Speaker well knows, that attempt was voted down on a virtual straight party line vote.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, the need to modify the rules of the House is not a partisan issue, but is acknowledged by both Republicans and Democrats.

Accordingly, I am today introducing, with 64 cosponsors, the package of amendments which were not considered on the third. These are not radical changes, but they are important. They would do such things as reform the system of proxy voting which afflicts the committee system; they would permit notice of attempts to consider legislation under a closed rule; they would guarantee recorded votes on tax increases and appropriations bills.

In all, Mr. Speaker, the package includes 30 reforms, reforms which would go a long way toward making this House accountable to the voters of the Nation. I invite all Members of the House to join with me in pushing for committee consideration and action of the floor.

The American people have waited too long.

ELDERLY CAREGIVER EQUITY PROPOSAL

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the problem of caring for the homebound elderly is becoming a very serious issue. It is estimated that approximately 10 percent of the population needing assistance with at least two basic activities of daily living are being cared for by family members with no help from outside sources. As the elderly population increases, the problem will only get worse.

This is a difficult and complex problem that must be addressed in many different ways. I would like to draw my colleagues' attention to an approach proposed by a group in New Jersey called the Association of Elderly Caregivers. This group urges States to change probate laws so that elder care given by a friend or family member can be considered when settling an estate.

The Association of Elderly Caregivers' caregiver equity proposal follows:

There is a popular myth that most familymembers care for their elderly parents.

The reality is that care, when necessary, usually falls upon the one familymember, usually the woman, willing to shoulder it, while the others distance themselves, sometimes for years and usually without valid reason.

This is particularly unfortunate when an elderly parent dies intestate, without a Will, or, suffering from Alzheimer's Disease or other mental impairment, has been unable to execute or update one.

In such cases, present probate laws mandate that the parent's estate, monies or other property be arbitrarily divided among immediate familymembers without regard to the caregiver's care and the other familymembers lack of concern.

It is easy to chastize, criticize and penalize for failure to plan ahead, to execute, regularly update and revise Wills, although nothing suggested here urges otherwise.

But the reality is that caregiving costs, insurance, inadequacies, financial pressures, declining physical and mental capacities often prevent it.

Regardless, it is urged that those supporting or encouraging familymember care of needy elderly parents should send a signal.

Probate laws governing Wills, estates and intestate decedents are not 'writtren in stone.' They like all manmade laws can be revised and updated and, indeed, should be, since there is a strong argument that updating is long overdue to meet problems presented by a growing aging population, rising medical and institutionalizing costs, declining family ties, reduced governmental social expenditures, etc.

Laws that do not meet the needs of the times do not inspire confidence.

A FATHER'S TRIBUTE

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, I was very deeply touched by a recent story in the Washington Post about Kevin McLinton, the son of one of the great Washington Redskins' linebackers, the late Harold (Tank) McLinton. Although Kevin lost his father when he was only 9 years old, Tank's spirit lives on in his son.

I congratulate Kevin McLinton on his outstanding performance in football and I wish him every continued success in his future. I am very happy to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues this very uplifting and inspiring report, "In Tribute to His Father, Kevin McLinton Nears the Top."

IN TRIBUTE TO HIS FATHER, KEVIN MCLINTON NEARS TOP

(By Jim Brady)

When Kevin McLinton crossed the goal line with the 99-yard interception return that clinched Springbrook High School's Maryland Class 4A state football championship in November, he was chased by teammates anticipating the imminent celebration. But for Kevin McLinton, the celebration has to wait.

"As soon as I scored on that interception, I fell to my knees and said, 'Dad, this one's for you,'" he recalled. "I think he would have been proud of me after that."

When he was 9, Kevin's father died. His mother, Agnes, said it came at a time when Kevin and his father were "getting close. Kevin was admiring him, emulating him."

Harold (Tank) McLinton was an easy man to admire, and an admirable person to emulate. McLinton, the Washington Redskins' middle linebacker from 1969 to 1979, was a quiet man known for his work in helping other people. Ironically, he was in the process of doing just that when he was critically injured.

McLinton, 33, was returning from a speaking engagement at Lorton Prison on Oct. 1, 1980, when he stopped on the side of Interstate 295 in Southeast Washington to thank a woman he had followed because he had gotten lost. Standing near the side of the road, he was struck by a passing car. McLinton died on Oct. 31 from complications resulting from his massive injuries. At the time, former Redskins coach George Allen said, "The biggest loser is the Washington community."

"We were really close and [his death] took a lot out of me," said Kevin, 18. "I don't think I was the same for a while . . . But I started thinking, 'Instead of grieving, I should achieve something—do my best.'"

Eventually, Kevin's pain subsided, and he uses the positive memories of his father as the basis for a lifelong tribute.

"It doesn't bother me anymore," Kevin said. "When people mention [my father], I smile . . . Everything is falling into place."

And as the prices have fallen into place, Harold McLinton's son has gained his own identity.

Kevin, a senior at Springbrook, was instrumental in the school's state basketball championship last season and its state football title this season. A point guard, he is averaging just under 20 points for the 6-3 Blue Devils this season.

Despite his father's fame as a football player, Kevin did not play that sport until this season due to nagging injuries and his concentration on basketball. After he finally decided to play, the state championship made the wait bearable.

The Blue Devils finished 11-2. McLinton caught the game-winning touchdown pass with no time remaining in the state tournament semifinal victory over Friendly. In the 42-21 championship win over Churchill, he scored three touchdowns, including pass receptions of 46 and 54 yards, but the interception return was the most memorable.

McLinton averaged about 12 points per game on last season's basketball team. In the state championship game, his 30-foot desperation shot at the end of the first quarter sparked Springbrook to a victory over previously unbeaten Crossland.

Since his father's death, McLinton has often depended upon advice from Brig Owens, the former Redskins safety who was one of Harold's closest friends. Owens has remained close to the entire McLinton family and was in the stands for the state semifinal and championship football games.

"He's been like a second father to me," McLinton said. "He was always there to lend some advice and help out. He knew my dad well, so we've known him for a very long time. I know he wouldn't say something he didn't mean."

"He knows I'm always a phone call away," Owens said. "Regardless of where I am, I'll go anywhere and do anything to help him."

Owens sees a great similarity between Harold and Kevin. "If you close your eyes and listen to [Kevin], it's scary," he said. "They have the same mannerisms."

Although Kevin says he dedicates every game he plays to his father, his Springbrook coaches believe he has established his own style.

"He never says anything about his father, and I don't bring it up," said Springbrook football coach Bob Milloy.

"He does keep it to himself," Agnes McLinton said. "But if you ask him, he will talk about it freely."

Very freely.

"I always play for my father. I think about him every time I'm on the court or the field," Kevin said. "Every time things are really bad, I think, 'I've got to do it; Dad's looking down on you. You have got to do your best.'"

It was Harold McLinton's affinity for helping people that Kevin remembers most.

"I couldn't be like my father. He was one of a kind," Kevin said. "Last night, I was looking at some get well cards my father received in the hospital and I saw a lot of things that touched me. He was always helping kids, always going to jails, always going to hospitals, going to different places just to talk to people. He was a great man, really. Even when he was hit, he was trying to help someone out. That's always what he wanted to do. I am willing to help people out, too, but I couldn't do what he did. He did some amazing things."

Kevin hopes to follow the same path his father did. He wants to excel in athletics, then use the celebrity of being a professional athlete to help others less fortunate.

Largely because of the presence of his mother and 14-year-old brother Darren, Kevin wants to stay in the northeast for college, and that should not be difficult, considering the number of schools vying for his services. The chief question at the moment is which sport he will play.

Colleges have approached Kevin about basketball and football, and Towson State inquired about both. Kevin has no Bo Jackson illusions, saying he will decide between sports in a few weeks, but his mother already has made up her mind.

"I would prefer to see Kevin play basketball," she said. "Football has been all I know, but Kevin has dedicated so much time to basketball, and that's been his game."

When the decision finally is made, somehow, some way, Kevin knows his father will play a role in his choice.

"We were friends," Kevin said. "It's that friendship that matters . . . The team is important to me, and so is the way I play, but my father is always No. 1."

SOCIAL SECURITY AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, following is a synopsis of legislation being introduced today:

SOCIAL SECURITY AS AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY

CURRENT LAW

Section 702 of the Social Security Act gives the Secretary of Health and Human Services responsibility for the Old-Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance (OASDI) programs and the Supplemental Security Income (SSI) program, both of which have been delegated to the Social Security Administration to administer. In addition, HHS administers the Hospital Insurance and Supplemental Medical Insurance (Medicare) programs, the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) and Child Support Enforcement (CSE) programs, a variety of human service block grant programs under title XX of the Act, and the health research agencies such as the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The original (1935) Social Security Act established a Social Security Board composed of three members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. The members were appointed to staggered terms, and no more than two of the members could be from one political party. One member was designated Chairman.

A series of reorganizations and legislative changes led to the establishment of the Social Security Administration as a subordinate agency within the Department of Health and Human Services in the early 1950s. SSA was given responsibility for administering the Medicare program when it was established in the mid-1960s, and the SSI program in the mid-1970s. The reorganization of 1977 created a new Health Care Financing Administration (HCFA) which took the Medicare program out of SSA.

In recent years, SSA has experienced considerable instability in top leadership and administrative structure. SSA has had ten Commissioners in the last fifteen years, four of whom have served only as acting Commissioners. In addition, SSA has undergone several major reorganizations since 1975, which have displaced personnel at all levels and created repeated changes in responsibilities for program administration and policy development.

REQUIREMENT OF THE 1983 SOCIAL SECURITY AMENDMENTS

The January 1983 report of the National Commission of Social Security Reform endorsed in principle the idea of an independent agency, but recommended a feasibility study; a minority of five members stated that the independent agency should be implemented without further study. The Social Security Amendments of 1983 established a commission to report to the Committees on Ways and Means and Finance on how to implement a proposal to make the Social Security Administration an independent agency under a bipartisan board appointed by the President. The Commission made its report to the two committees on June 12, 1984.

PREVIOUS INDEPENDENT AGENCY LEGISLATION

Following the Commission Report, Rep. Pickle introduced independent agency legislation in the 98th Congress. A similar bill was introduced in the 99th Congress and passed the House of Representatives as H.R. 5050 on July 22, 1986, by a vote of 401 to 0. In the 100th Congress, Rep. Jacobs introduced H.R. 1036, which was generally identical to H.R. 5050. He is reintroducing this legislation in the 101st Congress.

BILL SUMMARY

The bill being introduced today would establish the Social Security Administration as an independent agency with administrative responsibility only for the social security and Supplemental Security Income (SSI) programs. The new agency would be governed by a bipartisan, three-member Social Security Board. Members of the Board would be appointed by the President, with the advise and consent of the Senate, and would serve staggered six-year terms, with the exception of the first three members whose terms would expire on January 31, 1992, January 31, 1994, and January 31, 1996, respectively. Board members could only be removed from office for neglect of duty or malfeasance.

The Chairperson of the Board would be designated by the President for a four-year term. The Board would establish broad legislative, regulatory, and administrative policy for the agency. The policies and regulations of the Board would be covered under the notice and public comment provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946.

To handle day-to-day administration, the Board would appoint an Executive Director to act as chief operating officer. The Executive Director would be appointed to a four-year term and could be removed only for cause. The bill also establishes the positions of Deputy Director, General Counsel, Inspector General, and Beneficiary Ombudsman within the new agency.

The legislation would provide the new Social Security Administration with demonstration authority to perform certain management functions controlled by the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) and the General Services Administration (GSA). Specifically, the Board would have authority to test the new agency's capacity to recruit, compensate, and manage personnel and to acquire and maintain facilities and automated data processing equipment. After 18 months, the General Accounting Office would report to Congress on the outcome of the demonstration projects and assess the readiness of the agency to assume permanent and full authority for these management functions.

To adjust for the new agency's expanded responsibilities, the Board would submit a work-force plan to OPM which would serve as a basis for an increase in the number of Senior Executive Service positions allocated to the new agency. The legislation also stipulates that the Department of Health and Human Services would transfer to the new agency six level V and six level IV Executive Schedule positions.

In general, the bill would take effect July 1, 1990.

INFANT MORTALITY

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce legislation which goes a long way toward addressing our Nation's greatest tragedy—infant mortality. Our children are our most valuable resource, yet the United States currently ranks 19th among industrialized nations in the incidence of infant mortality. Although we have enacted expansions in the Medicaid Program in recent years, we cannot rest on our laurels. We must push ahead and continue to increase access to the minimum health benefits afforded pregnant women and infants through the Medicaid Program.

Last year, Congress enacted legislation spearheaded by my colleague Mr. WAXMAN which mandated coverage of pregnant women and infants up to 100 percent of the Federal poverty level. Based on 1987 figures, that would amount to an annual salary of $9,056 for a family of three. Last year, in my home State of Texas, the threshold for Medicaid eligibility for a family of three was 24.2 percent of the poverty level. If a family of three living in Texas has an annual income of $2,208 or more, they make too much to qualify for Medicaid. No one can deny that last year's expansion was desperately needed, nor can anyone deny that further expansions are necessary.

The legislation that I offer today is based on recommendations made by then-Presidential candidate George Bush who, in his publication "Access to Health Care for All Americans Fact Sheet," endorsed a phase-in of Medicaid coverage for all pregnant women and children under 1 year of age, up to 185 percent of poverty.

I applaud the President's foresight in this area and commend him for making this statement. I look forward to working with the new Bush administration in bringing to life his vision of a "kinder and gentler America." I firmly believe that this proposal will help to make his vision a reality.

In addition to expanding Medicaid coverage for pregnant women and infants up to 185 percent of poverty, my proposal eliminates the assets test, which has previously barred women from receiving services that they desperately needed. Further, my proposal requires States, in calculating income necessary for pregnant women and infants, to deduct the costs of necessary child care from gross income.

Current law allows States to adopt a streamlined eligibility process under which all pregnant women applying for Medicaid would be immediately eligible for services for a period of 45 days, or until the application is acted upon. Only 19 States have adopted this process commonly known as presumptive eligibility. My bill requires States to implement presumptive eligibility for all pregnant women and allows States to cover outreach services for pregnant women and infants.

I commend the National Commission to Prevent Infant Mortality for their efforts in this area. While this legislation does not reflect all of the Commission recommendations, primarily due to budget constraints, I feel that this legislation is an important step in reducing the number of infant deaths in the United States.

AIDS, THE VOTERS, AND A MEMBER OF CONGRESS

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, in the category of things I wish I could have said as well, is the letter I received today from our colleague from Massachusetts, BARNEY FRANK.

It is worth reprinting. I will use it answering the complaints I receive from constituents about the enormous amount of time and public money the House chews up listening to hysterical, homophobic tirades.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, February 1, 1989.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: This is about AIDS, the voters and William Dannemeyer.

From time to time, the House is accused of being "out of touch with the will of the people." Since it is the people we are accused of ignoring who determine the composition of this body every two years, this assertion is, logically, an attack on the voters' ability to know and express their own minds.

Not surprisingly, those who make this attack try to deny its anti-democratic implications. In a peculiar mental leap, many of them argue that the very fact that almost all House Members are regularly re-elected is a sign that we do not represent those who vote for us. Other than making House elections look more like professional wrestling, and agreeing among ourselves to lose a few every now and then, I do not think a great deal can be done about that.

But there is something we can do about the charge that we have defied the public's will on a particular issue: test the outcome of our deliberations against reliable indications of public opinion. The recent referendum in California on the AIDS initiative proposed by our colleague, Mr. Dannemeyer, offers us a chance to test one of the most frequently repeated charges that the House is "out of touch". Mr. Dannemeyer has from time to time expressed his frustration with what he sees as the unwillingness of the Members of the House to listen to the American people with regard to AIDS. (I do not mean to suggest that he has singled us out—Mr. Dannemeyer has also been extremely critical of the AIDS policies promulgated by Ronald Reagan's appointee as Surgeon General, Dr. Koop; Ronald Reagan's appointee to head the AIDS Commission, Admiral Watkins; Ronald Reagan's appointee to head the Office of Personnel Management, Dr. Constance Horner; a majority of the rest of Ronald Reagan's appointees to the AIDS Commission; leaders of the American Medical Association, the CDC, and a wide range of other groups.)

Driven by this frustration last year, Mr. Dannemeyer took his case to as large a segment of the American population as can be asked to vote on a single policy issue—the voters of California.

In 1986, Mr. Dannemeyer backed an initiative put together by the prominent felon and medical authority, Lyndon LaRouche, and when that effort to deal with AIDS was overwhelmingly repudiated by the voters, its supporters attributed its defeat in substantial part to the unpopularity of Mr. LaRouche. So in 1988 Mr. Dannemeyer put his own initiative on the ballot, one in which he was free to frame the proposal as he wished. The proposals he put forward bore, not surprisingly, a strong resemblance to some of the proposals he has offered unsuccessfully on the Floor of the House.

A very vigorous debate ensued with a good deal of both paid and unpaid media. (California voters by now have had the chance to get very familiar with the referendum process, since that state puts so large a percentage of its important public questions on the ballot that I sometimes wonder what it is they pay their legislators to do.)

The result of this vigorous public debate on a set of proposals which Mr. Dannemeyer himself framed was very much the same as the result that has occurred when we have dealt with these issues in the House: the Dannemeyer proposals were very soundly defeated. Statewide, 5,786,000 people voted against the Dannemeyer initiative, Proposition 102, while 3,027,000 voted for it. In Orange County, the home county of Mr. Dannemeyer, and our colleague Mr. Dornan, the no vote was 506,302, while the yes vote was 325,396. In Mr. Dannemeyer's own congressional district, doubtless as a tribute to the respect his own constituents have for him, his initiative did better than it did on the statewide ballot by 6 percentage points—he was only defeated on his initiative in his own congressional district by a margin of 59.6 percent to 40.3 percent.

I eagerly await this year's debate on AIDS issues in which we may well be told that the trouble with this country is that the people are out of touch with themselves.

BARNEY FRANK.

STUDENT LOAN INTEREST

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Tuesday, January 31, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to correct a tremendous error in the Tax Reform Act of 1986. By classifying student loan interest as consumer rather than investment interest, the Tax Reform Act made student loan interest nontax deductible. Educating our youth is the purest form of investing in the future of our country. My legislation reinforces this principle by making student loan interest tax deductible.

Escalating education costs place an enormous financial burden on our students. Graduate students in particular may incur debts so large that their initial payments on loans consist mainly of interest. Allowing a tax deduction of this interest could actually be a matter of economic survival for several higher education graduates; 255 of my colleagues sponsored this legislation in the 100th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, deducting student loan interest is a step in the right direction for our Nation's students.

BLACK HISTORY MONTH

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join my colleagues in the House in celebrating and commemorating February as Black History Month.

In 1926, Dr. Carter G. Woodson, known as the father of black history, established Negro History Week—in 1976 extended to a month—because he recognized the need for all to recognize the history and culture of black Americans.

Our Nation recently observed a national holiday in tribute to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. I was a proud sponsor of the resolution which established his birthday as a national holiday.

In addition to Dr. King, there are now and have been many black achievers in the United States. It is fitting that a month be set aside to honor the significant achievements of black Americans, many of whom have lived in Louisville and Jefferson County, KY, the district I am honored to represent in Congress.

One such outstanding black American was Grace James, a physician.

Dr. James, who passed away last month, served the city of Louisville and its black community for some 37 years. From providing health care to all in need to promoting civil rights, Dr. James was an inspiration to all around her.

Some of her more important contributions were: being the first black woman to serve on the faculty of the University of Louisville School of Medicine, and establishing the West End Medical Center, a health facility in the inner-city area of Louisville.

Dr. James served as the only medical doctor at the center and, thus, she attended to more than 100 patients weekly.

Not only was Dr. James concerned with health, but also with pressing issues such as teenage pregnancy and education. She founded the teen awareness project to help reduce the teenage pregnancy rate and to help educate youths. And, while serving as president of the Louisville Chapter of the NAACP, Dr. James fought for better educational opportunities for blacks within the public school system.

She also served on the Council on Urban Education, a group primarily concerned with addressing educational problems black children encounter. In recognition of her efforts to improve education, a scholarship fund has been set up in Dr. James' name at Meharry Medical College in Nashville, TN.

I am proud to honor an individual such as Dr. Grace James. The city of Louisville will miss her leadership and tenacity, but her memory will, I hope, inspire others to a life of service and commitment to their own communities.

A TRIBUTE TO DAVID RAMSAY

HON. BOB CLEMENT

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to David Ramsay, chairman of the Tennessee Monument Commission, for his efforts to get the Tennessee Monument at the Gettysburg Battlefield. Until Mr. Ramsay began his promotion of a monument in 1965, Tennessee was the only State of the 29 States that had men in combat at Gettysburg to not be represented.

I want to personally thank Mr. Ramsay for his efforts to ensure that the brave men who fought at Gettysburg are honored. The memorial is dedicated to the memory of the men who served in the 1st, 7th, and 14th Tennessee Infantry Regiments, the Archers Brigade, Heth Division, and Third Army Corps.

Mr. Speaker, I am including the speech given by Mr. Ramsay at the dedication of the Tennessee Monument at Gettysburg. Again, I want to thank Mr. Ramsay for all his work in ensuring that Tennessee is represented at Gettysburg.

DEDICATION ADDRESS OF THE TENNESSEE MONUMENT AT GETTYSBURG, PA—JULY 3, 1982

Since the beginning of time, the Sun has risen from out of the east and traveled in its natural course across the hemisphere, casting its warm and cosmic rays of light upon the Earth, sustaining life and providing energy to the people on Earth, to finally settle in the west. Today on this historic occasion, it may be appropriate . . . that we take poetic license and imagine that the Sun shines with an added glory . . . the glory of casting its rays of light upon the full complement of monuments and memorials here at Gettysburg honoring the sons of the twenty-nine States that participated in the battle which took place on the first, second and third days of July in the year of our Dear Lord 1863 . . . Perhaps to cast several extra rays welcoming Tennessee to her rightful resting place of honor on these hallowed grounds . . . History tells us that the Federal Union emerged as the victor of the War Between the States but as we look out upon this great national military park at Gettysburg and others across the Nation, we see Union and Confederate monuments and memorials literally standing side by side in peace and quiet . . . This is a testimonial to the fact that the battles . . . the victories and defeats as well as the travesties that war brings . . . are the common properties and responsibilities of the American people, and we as Americans cannot allow ourselves to be insensitive to these images . . . In fact, we should have a deep and transcendent sense in this respect . . . The very presence of these monuments give evidence that the American people have assumed their responsibilities and rightfully claimed them as their property . . . This is the American tradition and the lifeblood of our American heritage . . . After the war had ended and the smoke had blown away and the crack of the musket and boom of the cannons had dissipated into eternity, the stars that once graced Confederate banners and guidons took their place as stripes in Old Glory, and all this truly made Old Glory the Star Spangled Banner . . . May she wave forever, and forever she will be the grace of God . . . From these several scenes, cannot we again take poetic license and although we cannot write this in the pages of history, resolve here today that the War Between the States was won by American, of whom for a period of time some wore blue . . . others gray . . . as they fought a duel of honor . . . on the field of honor . . . largely by men of honor and so settled their differences in that fashion . . . from out of which emerged a united nation . . . We must consider that these men in blue and gray fought in order to preserve their beliefs and personal convictions . . . they followed the dictates of their hearts while in the performance of their simple duties as they best understood them at the time . . . If Americans did not possess these traits our Nation would not have been born in 1776, nor would it have survived in later wars in which we were involved . . . Let us count our blessings from these things . . . Let us also remember that the very descendents of the men who wore the blue and the gray stood and fought side by side in later wars in order to defend our great nation and our beloved Star Spangled Banner—the dedication of the Tennessee Monument here today is in a sense a rededication of all the other twenty-eight State monuments in that it marks the first reunion of the twenty-nine States here at Gettysburg . . . A reunion that will last forever and in peace—this Tennessee Monument is here today because many patriotic Americans and citizens of other countries wanted it here . . . But it is here for a far greater and nobler reason . . . It is here because the good lord wanted it here. This monument carries a high and sacred image as all other monuments of this nature do . . . We know that the lord gives us life as a gift and what we make of our lives is our gift to him when he calls us home . . . In that this monument honors 775 of his children, what greater gift can we give him when the time comes than the efforts we have made . . . And when the lord wants something done on Earth that benefits mankind, such as monuments of this nature of discoveries in science and medicine . . . He from time to time chooses from among his children on Earth certain ones to perform these various tasks and with his help those so chosen become the tools and implements of his divine profession such as many of us here today and elsewhere have become . . . In humble commemoration of these sublime and august scenes, I now say to you . . . to those of you who believe . . . Let us fold our hands in prayer and look up to heaven with these thoughts . . . Oh Lord our heavenly Father . . . we are so proud that you chose so many of us to do this job for you . . . our fondest hopes are that we have completed this task in a fashion such that it will so receive your divine approval . . . And now we say unto you, all present are accounted for at Gettysburg . . . mission accomplished . . . Amen . . . Amen . . . Amen.

BUSH MEDICAID CHILD HEALTH INITIATIVES H.R. 832, H.R. 833, AND H.R. 800

HON. HENRY A WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, 4 months ago, during a Presidential campaign noteworthy for its lack of specificity on policy issues, George Bush made three very specific proposals to expand Medicaid coverage for pregnant women, infants, and children. Today I am joining with Mr. LELAND and other members of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment to introduce legislation to implement each of these three promises.

President Bush promised, and I quote, that he would "provide the leadership to ensure a national commitment to all infants and to ensure that children continue to have access to primary health care and basic medical services throughout their childhood." This is a goal that all of us—Democrats and Republicans—can wholeheartedly support.

President Bush made three specific proposals.

First, in order to reduce infant mortality, he "supports measures to phasing in coverage of all pregnant women and children under one year of age, up to 185 percent of poverty."

Second, he "supports proper health care through mandatory Medicaid coveage for all children with family incomes below 100 percent of the Federal poverty level, working with those at highest risk as the first priority."

Third, he "will work to develop * * * mandatory Medicaid coverage of functionally disabled children who would have to be in a hospital or other institution without such coverage for home care."

Each of these promises was set forth in the Bush campaign white paper, "Invest in Our Children" October 1988, at pages 5 and 6.

The bills I am introducing today would implement each of these proposals. In addition, each bill includes some additional proposals that are consistent with the Bush policies but do not reflect specific commitments he has made. Some of these additional items were recommended by the National Commission on Infant Mortality, chaired by Senator LAWTON CHILES.

The first of the three initiatives, the Medicaid Infant Mortality Amendments of 1989, would phase in, over 3 years, a requirement that States extend Medicaid coverage to pregnant women and infants up to age 1 with incomes below 185 percent of the Federal poverty level—$17,900 per year for a family of three. This legislation is sponsored by Mr. LELAND, Mr. HYDE, myself, and a number of our colleagues.

I would particularly like to acknowledge the leadership of Mr. LELAND, a member of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment who has worked tirelessly during his career in the Congress to reduce infant mortality and improve the health status of poor children.

I would also like to recognize the contributions that Mr. HYDE has made to improvements in Medicaid coverage for pregnant women and infants over the past few Congresses. While we have profound differences on some issues, Mr. HYDE and I agree on the need for expanded Medicaid coverage to assure access to prenatal and maternity care for high-risk, low-income women. He has championed similar initiatives in the last two Congresses, and I look forward to working with him again to enact this legislation.

Finally, I want to note the involvement of Mr. MILLER, chairman of the House Select Committee on Children, Youth, and Families, in each of these three initiatives. Mr. MILLER's committee has played an important role in educating the Congress and the public about the value of preventive interventions, such as prenatal care, in improving child health and reducing Federal spending.

We do not yet have estimates on the entire bill from the Congressional Budget Office. However, preliminary, unofficial CBO staff estimates are that phasing in the mandate to cover pregnant women and infants with incomes up to 185 percent of the poverty level would result in additional Federal outlays of about $120 million over the next 3 years.

The second initiative, known as the Medicaid Child Health Amendments of 1989, would phasein, one year at a time, a requirement that States extend Medicaid coverage to all children with incomes up to 100 percent of the Federal poverty level—$9,690 per year for a family of three. Again, Mr. LELAND, Mr. MILLER, and other Members join me in introducing this legislation. Preliminary, unofficial CBO staff estimates are that this requirement will increase Federal Medicaid spending by $200 million over the next 3 years. Estimates are not yet available for other items in the bill which are likely to increase Federal outlays.

Five years from now, when the changes proposed in these two initiatives are fully phased in, we will have extended Medicaid coverage to an estimated 160,000 pregnant women, 170,000 infants, and 1.1 million children over age 1 who are poor. I am confident that, by giving these low-income women and children the ability to afford needed health care, we will help to reduce this country's disgraceful infant mortality rate and improve the health status of our Nation's poor children.

The final initiative, the Medicaid Technology-Dependent Children Amendments of 1989, would require the States to offer Medicaid services in the community to technology-dependent children under 18 who: First, are in hospitals or are at risk of institutionalization second, who can appropriately be cared for at home; and third, whose care would be no more expensive in the community than in a hospital. The bill makes no change in current income or resource eligibility standards, or in the types of benefits States may offer under current law. According to unofficial preliminary estimates from CBO staff, it may cost as much as $100 million per year in new Federal Medicaid spending.

I want to emphasize that these are modest, incremental proposals. Each of these changes is just the logical extension of Medicaid improvements the Congress has enacted over the past 4 years.

Coverage of pregnant women and infants up to 185 percent of poverty is now optional for the States, and 12, including relatively poor States like Mississippi, already cover this group.

Coverage of children up to 100 percent of poverty is now optional for the States, and 21 have already elected to do so.

Coverage of technology-dependent children at home is now optional for the States, and 22 already do so.

These are initiatives that both Democrats and Republicans can and do support. I look forward to working with the President and his new Secretary of Health and Human Services to enact these initiatives this year.

THE BICENTENNIAL HOUSE RESTORATION AMENDMENTS

HON. LYNN MARTIN

OF ILLINOIS

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to join with our distinguished Republican leader, Mr. MICHEL, and Republican Policy Committee chairman, Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma, in cosponsoring the Bicentennial House Restoration Amendments of 1989. This is a package of 30 amendments to House rules and directives to its committees, to restore the "People's House" as we commemorate its 200th anniversary.

We originally attempted to offer this package as a substitute for the resolution from the Democratic caucus, providing for the adoption House Rules on January 3, 1989. But, our effort was blocked on a predictable party-line vote on the previous question. At that time I inserted a paragraph-by-paragraph summary of our Republican package at page H14 of the January 3 RECORD.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I include the Republican conference's commentary on our House reform package entitled "A Bicentennial Mandate: To Restore the People's House." It is my hope that the Rules Committee will give early consideration to these proposals. The commentary follows:

A BICENTENNIAL MANDATE: TO RESTORE THE PEOPLE'S HOUSE

(Republican Conference House Rules Package, 101st Congress)

Introduction: In 1788, Alexander Hamilton described the role of the House of Representatives under the proposed Constitution as follows: "Here, sir, the people govern. Here they act by their immediate representatives."

Over the past two-hundred years, the People's House has evolved with that overriding aim in mind—to ensure the survival of a government that is truly, in Lincoln's words, "of the people, by the people, and for the people."

And yet, over the last several years, some disturbing trends have begun to move the House of Representatives in the opposite direction—away from the people, and away from its control by their immediate representatives.

Mainly as a result of Democratic Party rule for 52 of the last 56 years, the House has become less democratic and more autocratic. The reasons for this subtle, yet alarming, change in the House are not difficult to discern: the majority party has become more interested in self-preservation and perpetuation in office than in direct representation and accountability to the people. With an incumbent reelection rate of 98 percent, is it any wonder that the institution has become complacent, musclebound and insulated by the obsesity of power?

It's not just that power tends to corrupt, though there is ample evidence of that; it is that those entrusted with power tend to forget the reason it was originally bestowed on them, and the retention of power becomes an end in itself.

The majority Democrats have been willing to relinquish deliberative process, direct representation, and decision-making to their Leadership in return for the trappings and perequisites of power designed to ensure their reelection.

As we commemorate the Bicentennial of the Congress in 1989, we must rededicate ourselves to the foundation on which our National government was built: "We, the People." The Democratic majority has controlled the House for so long that it has lost sight of the "the People" in its self-aggrandizing quest to promote the "We."

It is therefore especially appropriate that the people once again heed the Declaration's call to abolish an autocratic system that no longer derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. To that, end we pledge ourselves to this "Bicentennial Mandate: To Restore the People's House."

The Committee System: Congressional committees have existed from the First Congress as agents of the House in fashioning legislation and conducting investigations. Woodrow Wilson, in his 1885 treatise, Congressional Government, wrote that, "Congress in session is Congress on public exhibition, whilst Congress in its committee rooms is Congress at work." Congressional committees truly are the workshops of the National Legislature in which the details of legislation are hammered-out on the anvil of compromise.

And yet, in recent years, the House committee system has deteriorated, and the quality of legislation and oversight has suffered accordingly. The reasons for this decline of the committee system are fairly evident. While the reforms of the seventies to make committee chairmen more accountable to their party caucuses have been laudable in intent, their effect has been to foster a proliferation of semi-autonomous subcommittees.

With this explosion of subcommittees and staff, Members have been saddled with more subcommittee assignments, making it nearly impossible to conscientiously perform any assignment. Committees and subcommittees have attempted to counter poor attendance with rules that permit business to be conducted with only one-third of the Members present and the liberal use of proxy votes. This phantom legislating has produced legislation that is less representative and well conceived than if more Members had actually been present.

Compounding the problem of legislative accountability is the practice of referring legislation to more than one committee. The House approved this procedure in 1974 but rejected an attempt to rationalize committee jurisdictions. The result has been a maze of tangled lines of responsibility between committees and subcommittees that is strangling the legislative process.

The authorizing committees are also falling prey to budgetary squeeze-out—sandwiched in time as they are between the adoption of a budget resolution and the beginning of the appropriations process. With less and less time in which to enact authorizations, more and more programs are either being funded without proper oversight and authority, are being packaged into omnibus bills such as reconciliation, or are being piggy-backed onto appropriations bills.

In an attempt to bring some order out of this committee chaos, the majority leadership has resorted to a variety of devices that have rendered authorizing committees nearly obsolete. These include circumventing authorizing committees altogether by bringing-up more and more bills either by suspending the rules or writing special rules. Even when committees report legislation, it is often rewritten in secret party task forces or by a single member of the leadership, then substituted for the committee product by the Rules Committee just before it is brought-up for House consideration. It is not unusual for Members to have no report or information on such a "surprise compromise." In summary, committees are becoming less and less relevant to the legislative process.

The Floor Situation: Given the shambles in which the House committee system finds itself today, it perhaps should not seem surprising that autocratic procedures are increasingly being used in an attempt to restore a measure of "efficiency" to the House. Unfortunately, "efficiency" has become a euphemism for political expediency and advantage, and has again come at the expense of deliberation and representation.

Whereas only 12 percent of the bills coming through the Rules Committee a decade ago were brought to the floor under "restrictive rules" which limit the amendments Members may offer, this percentage has increased with each succeeding Congress until it stands at 43 percent today. Just as the American people have been disenfranchised at the committee level with phantom legislative devices, they are being silenced on the House floor as well by such "gag" rules.

To further limit the amendment process, the majority leadership has increasingly been denying the minority party its traditional, century-old motion to recommit a bill with instructions in the form of a final amendment. Whereas a decade ago this right was never denied, in the 100th Congress it has been denied on 13 percent of the bills brought through the Rules Committee.

Another device being used increasingly by the majority leadership to avoid a direct vote on matters is the so-called "self-executing rule" whereby a procedural vote is used to automatically adopt a substantive legislative provision. Whereas a decade ago they were used on less than 1 percent of the bills brought through the Rules Committee, today they comprise nearly 16 percent of the special rules on bills.

Another way to avoid proper deliberation, amendments, and votes is the "suspension of the rules" procedure. Under this device bills can be brought-up without being reported from committee, are subject to only 40-minutes of debate, cannot be amended, and must receive a two-thirds vote to pass. Votes on suspension bills can be "clustered" on the day after the bills were actually debated. In one of the final weeks of the 100th Congress, some 83 bills were scheduled under suspension. Of the 46 bills debated on a Monday, the House cast 36 consecutive rollcall votes over a two-hour period the next day.

If the American people watching the House in action from the visitor's galleries or on TV are confused by all these goings on, they aren't too-far removed from their own Representatives who must often scramble to find out what it is they are voting on.

If, as Wilson observed, the "Congress in session is Congress on public exhibition," then today it is a poor exhibition of the representative and deliberate democracy the Founders intended. Much of this is traceable to the breakdown in the committee workshops. But the floor devices used to compensate for this breakdown have only made things worse both in terms of representation and the quality of legislation.

Restoring the People's House: The House Republican Conference is committed in this congressional bicentennial year to restore the People's House by making it a more representative and deliberative body. Any restoration must begin with shoring-up the foundation of the Legislative Branch, the committee system. To this end we recommend:

Realigning committee jurisdictions on more rational lines;

Abolishing the joint referral of bills to multiple committees;

Abolishing proxy voting;

Abolishing one-third quorum rules;

Requiring more open committee meetings;

Limiting committees to no more than six subcommittees;

Limiting Members to no more than four subcommittee assignments;

Adopting a committee staff ceiling and reducing staffs by 10%;

Publishing rollcall votes on reporting bills from committee;

Giving the President special rescission authority over unauthorized appropriations;

Restoring May 15th reporting deadline for authorizations;

Requiring representative party ratios on committees;

Formal adoption of oversight plans.

To strengthen accountability and deliberation on the House floor, we recommend:

Advance notice of floor schedule and five-day work weeks;

Advance notice of plans for rules limiting amendments;

Requiring two-thirds votes on self-executing rules;

Permitting separate votes on budget waivers and two-thirds vote on blanket waivers;

Requiring automatic rollcall votes on tax, appropriations, Member pay raise, and debt limit measures;

Placing strict conditions on continuing appropriations resolutions;

Prohibiting extraneous matters on reconciliation bills;

Placing limits on what bills can be considered under suspension;

Requiring Congress to comply with health, safety, employment and anti-discrimination laws which apply to other citizens.

TRIBUTE TO ADELE SCOTT SAUL

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, on December 6 of last year while the Congress was in recess a distinguished Pennsylvanian, Adele Scott Saul, died at her home in Rose Valley, PA.

The attached obituary which appeared in the Philadelphia Inquirer on Friday morning December 9 is a fitting and appropriate tribute to a gallant lady I was proud to call my friend. I am delighted to place the name of Adele Scott Saul in the RECORD and only regret that her own voice was never heard in this Chamber.

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Dec. 9, 1988]

ADELE SCOTT SAUL, 101; MADE RACE TO BE STATE'S FIRST CONGRESSWOMAN

(By Donna St. George)

Adele Scott Saul, 101, an independent-minded, outspoken liberal Democrat who took on the Republican machine in Delaware County when she sought to become the state's first congresswoman in 1940, died Tuesday at her former home in Rose Valley.

Possessed of a sharp intellect and a nurturing spirit, Mrs. Saul also was a founder in 1929 of the School in Rose Valley, a pioneer in the field of progressive education in America.

Her greatest public renown, however, came just before America's involvement in World War II, when the elegant, auburn-haired, blue-eyed mother of two decided to challenge the system.

At the time, she was active in civic groups, but a run for Congress wasn't something even she had contemplated.

Mrs. Saul and her husband, Maurice, a prominent Philadelphia lawyer and politically active Republican, had been vacationing in Florida when the county chairman of the Democratic Party wired Mrs. Saul and asked her to be the party's congressional candidate. She was shocked.

It took very little time for her to decide.

"Delaware County is a beautiful place to live, but I think it has been rotten politically," she once explained very simply to a reporter.

It was the first time in the county's history that a woman headed a political ticket.

Mrs. Saul was by no means unprepared. A 1911 graduate of Smith College—a history and government major who bought Victrola records of the speeches of presidential candidates—Mrs. Saul was later active in the suffrage movement.

In Rose Valley, she was the borough's first judge of elections and chairwoman of the Democratic Committee for Liberal Action. She also served the boards of the Community Center in Media and the Woman's Medical College in Philadelphia, and sat on the National Youth Administration Board in Delaware County.

In her campaign, she proclaimed she was out to fight "the one-party bossism" of the machine run by county GOP leader John J. McClure. Throughout her campaign she flogged the Republicans—despite participation by her husband, who was chairman of the Rose Valley Borough Council and in the GOP.

They threw parties at their Rose Valley home and offered beer, sandwiches and spike-less punch to visitors in the spacious rooms.

Maurice Saul passed out Havana cigars that were wrapped in cellophane embossed with the words "For Congress—Vote for Adele Saul, Democratic."

Mrs. Saul's issues were straightforward—youth and labor, the continuation and improvement of all social programs and "a national defense strong enough to discourage and repel any attack by any foreign power." She was a vocal supporter of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and the New Deal.

An Inquirer reporter at the time described her as "a realistic, feet-on-the-ground candidate who knows the issues and the reasons for them." However, Mrs. Saul was bucking a 4-1 Republican registration lead in the county.

When Election Day came and she lost, she made it closer than 2-1. She had 46,960 votes compared to the 69,649 votes won by her opponent, six-term incumbent James Wolfenden.

Mrs. Saul pursued her political interests long after her bid for office.

Described as a bright conversationalist—one who always informed her children that, despite popular thinking, politics and religion were the best subjects to discuss—she saw visitors most days for "elevensies": a snifter of brandy and a hearty chat at 11 a.m.

Until her death, she enjoyed reading the Wall Street Journal five days a week. That is, everything except the editorial page, which she called "conservative and uninspired." She liked a little sparring. Recently, she had chided a close, if conservative, family friend: "Now, you tell me why if the President—who is a very good actor but not a very bright man—tells me the economy is getting better, why then is the stock market down?"

During the 1988 presidential election, she insisted that Michael S. Dukakis would have won if only he had declared himself a liberal earlier in the campaign.

As pronounced as anything else, though, was her artistic side.

She loved painting, even loved the smell of turpentine, and at 101 had been busy in her studio the night before she died. Working in oil, she had over the years created perhaps 50 to 75 paintings—of landscapes, figures and flower arrangements.

The paintings showed talent, family members said, but she was never interested in showing them. Painting brought out her private, personal quality, and she used to reason that "a painting was never finished, just the way a person was never finished," her granddaughter said.

Mrs. Saul had been a trustee of Bennington College and an active supporter of such organizations as the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom and the Jane Addams Peace Association. She had a home in Key West, Fla. Her daughter now maintains her old home in Rose Valley.

Her mother was Adele Brabant Hamrich, whose father owned a department store on Chestnut Street, and her father, Henry J. Scott, was once an assistant district attorney in Philadelphia. She had attended Friends' Central School.

Her son, Robert Maurice Saul was killed during World War II. Her husband died in 1974.

Surviving are a daughter, Barbara Sprogell Jacobson; six grandchildren, five great-grandchildren and a sister, Mildred Scott Olmsted.

Services and interment will be at the convenience of the family.

TRIBUTE TO STS. CYRIL AND METHODIUS PARISH OF WARREN, OH

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the members of Sts. Cyril and Methodius Parish in my 17th Congressional District of Ohio. It is my sincere pleasure to congratulate this fine group of people on the 60th anniversary of the founding of their parish community.

Sts. Cyril and Methodius traces their heritage back to 1928 when the Most Reverend Joseph Schrembs of Cleveland organized the parish to serve Warren Catholics of Slovak descent. In 1933, the parish moved into its first church building. The church was blessed by the Most Honorable James A. McFadden, then auxiliary bishop of Cleveland. Sixteen years later, Bishop McFadden returned to Warren to dedicate a new church for the parish, one that is easily recognized as one of the most beautiful churches in the diocese.

Sts. Cyril and Methodius Parish can be proud of its past accomplishments. The parishioners have dedicated themselves to creating a strong and thriving parish, based on the spirit of good will and cooperation so strongly established by their ancestors in the promotion of Catholicism in their native countries.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the House join me today in congratulating the people of Sts. Cyril and Methodius Parish on the celebration of their anniversary. Let us wish them the best of luck for continued success in the future. May their next 60 years be as joyous and productive as the last 60 have been.

REAGAN OPPONENTS FAIL TO SEE CONTINUITY WITH BUSH

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, you couldn't tell from reading the newspapers that the Presidential candidate who represented a continuation of the policies of Ronald Reagan had won by a landslide.

The usual suspects are applauding what they describe as a more establishment oriented Cabinet surrounding George Bush, as if the talented men and women who contributed to the Reagan record of peace and prosperity were incompetent.

Columnist and former U.N. Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick knows better, and recently dispelled this ignorance in a column that appeared in the January 29, 1989 Post-Star in my hometown of Glens Falls, NY.

It's been said that history is the polemic of the victor. Fearing as I do the desire of America's political losers to rewrite our history to their own liking, I take great pleasure in entering the Kirkpatrick column in the RECORD.

[From the Glens Falls (NY) Post-Star, January 29, 1989]

HOW "NEW" IS BUSH'S VISION?

(By Jeane Kirkpatrick)

The new era of good feeling has begun in Washington, partygoers and network correspondents assured each other all week. Soviet troops are withdrawing from Afghanistan. Gorbachev is offering force reductions in Europe. The Iran-Iraq war has ended. A settlement has been achieved for Southern Africa and prospects are good for Cambodia. The Californians have gone somewhere. The Bushes are wonderful people. The new President has appointed a seasoned team of decent men.

Through all this talk runs like a subliminal chorus the theme: The establishment is back.

Some say this "establishment" consists of Rockefeller Republicans in power for the first time since Herbert Hoover or conceivably Dwight Eisenhower. Some say it is, broadly speaking, the Eastern establishment—the banks, the multinational corporations, the Trilateral Commission, the Kissingerians, that sort of thing. To some it seems just the "right people" tied together by family, friends, schools. "Insiders." Gentlemen.

It may be true that George Bush and his team have more ties to traditional American elites. And it is true that there are among them first-class, seasoned pros deeply knowledgeable about the fields they will oversee. National Security Adviser Brent Scowcroft, his deputy Robert Gates, Deputy Secretary of State-designate Lawrence Eagleburger and Secretary of Defense-designate John Tower are true specialists in government as well as security issues.

It is also true that the Reagan Administration included numerous such men.

Around the facts of the new Bush team, myths are rapidly developing as misleading as they are unfair to both the Reagan and Bush administrations.

Well-known political analyst and commentator Philip Geyelin wrote recently, for example, about the disorderly procedures of the Iran-Contra fiasco as he applauded the arrival of the new men, saying:

"A review of the wild and woolly workings of the Reagan Presidency for most of its eight years is simply a way of illustrating one change we can count on from the Bush administration. A decent and disciplined old hand like Brent Scowcroft would not . . . unleash Ollie North." Secretary of State James Baker would not "simply register his dissent to a policy he abhorred, then step aside. . . ."

Experienced public servants on the Bush team, Geyelin argued, will save the Republic from such "wild and woolly" adventures. What they lack in "vision" they will make up for in respect for "process."

There are three major flaws in the Geyelin complaints against the Reagan administration:

First, they ignore the presence and importance of the many experienced "in and outers" in the Reagan administration, for example, George Shultz and Caspar "Cap" Weinberger. Second, they ignore the fact that Iran-Contra—the only real foreign policy fiasco of Reagan's eight years—was caused by "decent, disciplines public servants" Robert "Bud" McFarlane and Adm. John Poindexter and not by some Reaganites who wandered into Washington. Third, they ignore the very substantial foreign policy success of the Reagan years.

Fair is fair. It is not fair to take the Iran-Contra mess as the quintessential expression of Ronald Reagan's eight years in foreign policy, or to treat Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan, agreement on Southern Africa and arms reductions as simple products of Mikhail Gorbachev's conversion to international cooperation. Neither can they be reasonably treated as unintended consequences of "orderly processes."

It is myopic to imagine that Ronald Reagan's "vision"—held in such contempt by Geyelin—did not spark these successes.

Geyelin knows as well as anyone that there were many in the upper ranks of the Reagan administration whose social and professional backgrounds resemble those in the Bush team. It is the vision he hopes will be different.

But during the campaign George Bush repeatedly assured Americans he shares the Reagan vision. Assuming that is the case, the return of the "establishment" will prove irrelevant to the substance of American government.

COMMEMORATING UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JAMES H. BILBRAY

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BILBRAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 71st anniversary of Ukraine's declaration of independence and the 70th anniversary of the unification of the Western Ukrainian National Republic with the Ukrainian National Republic.

It was on January 22, 1918, when the Ukrainian Central Rada (Council) issued the Fourth Universal, an unconditional declaration of independence for Ukraine. The Ukrainian National Republic issued the Third Universal in November 1917. This document served as a forerunner and outlined the rights for all Ukrainian citizens. The Third Universal announced the creation of a sovereign Ukrainian state, proclaimed its social and political principles, and articulated the same freedoms found in the American Bill of Rights.

Yet today, Ukraine, a founding member of the United Nations, a fully developed country, with a clearly defined territory, a constitution, and its own officially separate Soviet government remains suppressed by Soviet Russian domination in virtually every aspect of life.

With a full system of education from nursery schools to universities and research centers, theaters, motion picture industry, radio and television networks, newspapers, magazines, and book publishing houses, the country's major decisions continue to be made at the headquarters of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, which in fact runs the whole country.

Most of the policy decisions relating to its territory, the composition of its government, the subjects taught in its schools, the content of its media are made not in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine, but in Moscow, the capital of the Soviet Union of which the Ukraine is one of 15 constituent republics.

The second largest country in Europe, Ukraine, is the Soviet Union's second most populous and second most industrially developed republic. However, unlike a developing country, newly emerged from the grasp of a colonial power, Ukraine is a part of one of the last colonial powers on our planet.

Despite almost 70 years of Soviet Russian dominaton, the nationalistic feeling and dream of freedom and independence is still alive as evidenced by recent activities in Ukraine. The republic soon could pose a challenge to centralized Soviet power surpassing the similar calls for political and cultural autonomy being made by national groups from the Baltic States to Ukraine to Armenia.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues in remembering the Ukrainian Independence Day and the country's proclamation of autonomy within the Russian empire.

SECRETARY DON HODEL, A TRUE STEWARD OF OUR NATION'S LANDS

HON. DON YOUNG

OF ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. YOUNG of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this occasion to pay tribute to a great American, a great Secretary of the Interior and a good friend—Don Hodel.

Don Hodel is indeed a dedicated public servant who has served as Administrator of the Bonneville Power Administrator from 1972 to 1977; the Department of Energy during 1983 and 1984 and as Secretary of the Department of the Interior from February 7, 1985, to January 20, 1989. In each of these positions, Don Hodel has served with great distinction. I am most familiar with the great contributions he made while serving as the the Secretary of the Interior. In this position, he has been truly magnificent and his accomplishments will serve as his heritage to the future generations of our great country.

As the Secretary of the Interior, Don Hodel was charged by President Reagan to:

Protect our national park, wilderness, and wildlife resources.

Enhance our ability to meet our energy and mineral needs with domestic resources, thereby providing jobs for Americans.

Ensure a quality water supply.

Improve relations with States and local governments, and provide thorough, wise resource management employment for citizens who reside in areas where Federal lands are much of the land base.

Enhance the quality of life for native Americans and the people of the island territories.

Improve the overall management and efficiency of the Department of the Interior.

Don Hodel has acquitted himself in each of these diverse and sometimes conflicting charges with honor, dedication, and solid achievement. No trip was too long and wearying nor was any challenge too difficult to be accepted with alacrity and discharged with dispatch.

Responding to his charge regarding national parks and wildlife refuges, Don Hodel instituted and supervised a sound management system which has resulted in improving facilities and access in order that more people can enjoy and experience firsthand the natural treasures of our land. Policies to clean up litter, to preserve our beaches, and to replenish our wildlife have been implemented.

Don Hodel furnished the dynamic leadership which has enabled dramatic increases in the world populations of such diverse wildlife resources as sea turtles, antelope, striped bass, and caribou. His policies have been the policies of a shepherd who has sought not only to protect his flock but to increase their number to levels where ecology and wildlife populations can exist in an environment of harmony and tranquility; where there is a minimum of human interference with the laws of nature.

As a result of Don Hodel's active stewardship, over 205 recovery plans have been completed. The American alligator now swims again in our waters and the brown pelican soars above them. Likewise the programs to save the sea otter have been spectaculary successful and our national symbol the eagle is again the master of American skies. State and local governments responding to Don Hodel's initiatives now actively support a responsible stewardship of our public lands and natural resources both flora and fauna.

On May 1, 1988, Don Hodel stated that:

It is my concern that from a national standpoint we need to have an economy and a national security which is based on a sound volume of domestic energy supply.

Thus he answered the President's charge to him to enhance our Nation's energy needs from domestic sources.

To implement his plans, data collection and mapping programs were instituted. Atlases for the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean have been published. Soon to be completed are the mapping of the sea bottoms surrounding the States of Hawaii and Alaska. In April of 1987 Secretary Hodel recommended, on the basis of the U.S. Geological Survey and Bureau of Land Management assessments of the oil and gas potential of the coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge [ANWR], that Congress authorize exploration and development in the region. This was a difficult decision vigorously opposed by many national environmental groups, but few Alaskans. It again was typical of Don Hodel to choose the harder right rather than the easier wrong. The Nation will be in his debt for this decision.

Offshore leasing has increased dramatically during Secretary Hodel's administration and has been done in full compliance with the requirements of the National Environmental Policy Act. Meanwhile Don has also worked to facilitate exploration and developmental oil shale, coal, and alternative energy reserves.

I would be remiss not to mention the contributions which the Bureau of Mines has made to our technological advances. Some are soft soldering of aluminum, recycling of waste chromic solutions, recovery of cobalt from lead and copper ores and bureau-developed dry beatifical techniques for the recovery of gold and platinum from recycled miltiary scrap.

Certainly another major contribution made by Don Hodel have been his answers to the President's charge to ensure our country a quality water supply. The Department of the Interior is the manager of one of the world's largest water supply systems. Don Hodel early on espoused a policy of working with local governments to ensure cooperation. Projects were examined and rated. Completion plans for projects rather than hit lists were compiled. Cooperation with Indian tribes for negotiation of their water rights claims were undertaken and successes gained. Don Hodel also has addressed the environmentally damaging effects of irrigation damage. Solutions have been sought and hard decisions such as the cut off of future drainage water deliveries from California's Kesterson Reservoir made when, in a naturally occurring phenomenon, selenium reached hazardous levels. Not content Don worked with the California State Water Resources Control Board to ensure the adoption of a responsible clean up plan.

Fisheries have been improved, rivers cleaned up, and wetlands restored as Secretary Hodel's techniques of leadership and initiatives were applied.

To accomplish the foregoing Don Hodel instituted new approaches to State and local government. They were treated as partners in progress not legal litigants. He stated on February 26, 1985:

We encourage private investment, volunteerism, interaction with State and local governments and with private users to share in the funding and administration of various activities of predominantly local interest.

Certainly, Don Hodel is the walking epitome of a "good neighbor" policy. His years in office are replete with success stories ranging from the transfer and exchange of public land to State and local authorities in the putting into place 40 Cooperative Fish and Wildlife Research Units in cooperation with the States and local grant universities.

Equally enthusiastic was Don Hodel's approach to our island territories and to the Indian tribes. Both island territories and Indian tribes were provided the training and the tools to help them help themselves. Efforts were focused on increasing the capabilities of local governments in the insular areas and reducing the role of the Department of the Interior. Private sector development has been emphasized and investments and tourism promoted. Much progress has been made but Secretary Hodel was always in the vanguard of those urging increased emphasis on the initiatives which will lead to independence, self-reliance, and prosperity for the island populations—technical know-how, home-owned industry, eradication of disease, and better educational facilities and policies.

Don Hodel met the challenges offered by the problems facing the Indian tribes with equal vigor. He laid a groundwork for reducing their dependency on the Federal Government. He stressed the importance of tribal governments for playing an ever greater role in their local communities to improve the quality of life.

Of special interest to me and my constituents was the way that he demanded action and accelerated the conveyance of land pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act. In excess of 20 million acres have been transferred on behalf of my constituents. I especially applaud his dedication and determination to right old wrongs and redress longstanding grievances.

Charged last with improving the overall management and efficiency of the Department of the Interior, Don Hodel has been an outstanding success. He has been a peerless leader. While cutting the budget, he has increased overall efficiency. While reducing the number of staff personnel, he has restored morale. Pride of being a member of Don's team and of accomplishment has replaced the tedious, dull, business-as-usual attitude throughout the ranks from warden and ranger to the senior executive staff.

Don, you are a truly outstanding leader. Your example of selfless dedication, devotion to duty, and honor in all things has been seldom equaled in the history of our great country. I salute you, Alaska thanks you, and America loves you.

PENSION BENEFITS FOR CLERGY MEMBERS

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today which would address a problem faced by many retired clergy members, whose pensions are artificially limited by a technical provision of the Tax Code. My bill would enable them to receive the full pension to which they should be entitled based on their preretirement compensation.

Under present law, an individual's annual pension payments may not exceed the average of the recipient's high 3 years of preretirement compensation, unless that average is under $10,000, in which case he may receive up to $10,000 annually. Compensation is defined as taxable compensation.

The problem for many members of the clergy, however, is that they receive a considerable portion of their usually modest compensation as a nontaxable payment for room and board, often known as a parsonage allowance. Section 107 of the Internal Revenue Code specifically gives this allowance tax-free status.

The intent of the law—to limit overly generous pension benefits—is grossly distorted when it does not permit these retired clergy members, most of whom are modestly paid, to receive an amount equal to their actual preretirement compensation.

The result is that many retired clergy members who have put in decades of service have their pensions arbitrarily limited. This would not occur if they were permitted to include their parsonage allowance in determining their preretirement compensation. The present interpretation is unfair, and I don't think it makes sense.

The law gives the Internal Revenue Service flexibility in determining what constitutes compensation for purposes of determining maximum pension payments. However, the IRS has chosen not to include parsonage allowances in this definition. Thus, I believe Congress must act.

My bill addresses this problem in a very simple way. It includes in preretirement compensation, for purposes of determining maximum pension benefits, the value of a clergy member's parsonage allowance.

Let me emphasize that this bill does not mandate any specific pension benefit for a clergy member. It simply allows employers to pay a higher benefit to those who have worked long enough and been compensated enough to qualify for that higher benefit.

Mr. Speaker, this bill would correct what I believe is an unintended impact of the legislation we have passed in recent years to limit excessive tax-deferred pension plans. I hope my colleagues will support this measure.

Following is the text of my bill:

H.R. 809

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) paragraph (3) of section 415(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (defining average compensation for high 3 years) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'compensation' includes amounts excluded from gross income under section 107."

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall apply to years beginning after December 31, 1989.

A TRIBUTE TO A HERO IN BROOKLYN

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, it is with great admiration that I call my colleagues' attention to the heroic actions of the 21-year-old Tom Genovese of Brooklyn.

Mr. Genovese, who works for a private security company, rescued nine people from a three-alarm fire in Brooklyn. On December 11, 1988, he was following two suspicious individuals when he heard a scream. A house around the corner was engulfed in flames, Mr. Genovese entered the house and escorted a hysterical girl to safety.

By this time, the fire has spread to a neighboring synagogue. Tom Genovese called to see if anyone was inside the burning synagogue. Upon hearing no answer, Mr. Genovese kicked the front door down. The rabbi's wife stood in the hallway crying because her husband was paralyzed with fear upstairs. Mr. Genovese carried the rabbi, on his shoulders, downstairs and out of the house to safety.

The young man's heroism did not end there. He ran into the house next door, which had just caught fire. There he found two elderly ladies and an elderly gentleman, all in need of his assistance. Mr. Genovese led these women to safety and then carried the man, who could not walk, away from the fire. Finally, Tom Genovese went into one last house helping three women save their valuables and escape the fire.

It is with profound gratitude and admiration that I share with my colleagues the brave deeds of Mr. Genovese, who had only worked for Task Force Security, Inc., for 2 weeks, when he served his fellow citizens and Brooklyn so boldly. It is reassuring to know that such valor still exists in young men, who are willing to risk their own lives in order to help save others.

TRIBUTE TO EVENDALE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. THOMAS A. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to give a well-deserved pat on the back to the Evendale Elementary School and congratulate the people of Evendale on the school's acceptance into the 1988 Elementary School Recognition Program by the U.S. Department of Education.

Evendale Elementary's beliefs in the principles of democracy, in universal education, in education as a right and privilege, in a changing world, and in the community as a supportive partner make for a school with a conscience. There is a concerted effort by staff, parents, and students to make the system work at its best. This seems to have happened because statistics have shown that 100 percent of the students who have been in the school for at least 3 years have moved to the junior high school at or above their grade level.

The Princeton City School District has promoted high standards of learning. This is evident through the variety of instructional techniques; through the problem solving and critical thinking skills taught throughout the curriculum; and through the school climate of warmth and caring.

I am very proud to include the Evendale Elementary School in my district and have every expectation that the exceptional work of the teachers, coaches, administration, and students will continue to make me proud. The future of our children and community well-being can safely rely on their efforts.

FLORIO HONORS MAYOR GLORIA KOLODZIEJ

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues an outstanding individual from the State of New Jersey, the Honorable Gloria Kolodziej, mayor of Clifton, NJ.

Since her election to Clifton City Council in 1981 to fill the unexpired term of her late husband, Joseph Kolodziej, Gloria has become one of the most recognized and revered public officials in Passaic County. In 1982, running for her first full term, she received the largest number of votes, which qualified her for the position of mayor. In 1986, she again garnered the largest number of votes, earning her an unprecedented second term as mayor.

Gloria Kolodziej is recognized as a pragmatic, hands-on leader who has opened the doors of city hall to the residents of Clifton. In her first term she established the strategic planning committee, a group of volunteers from local businesses and community homeowners, and her own office created to outline a plan for the city's fiscal management. This plan has solidified the city's financial position and has prepared it well for the 1990's.

Along with winning her late husband's seat on council, Gloria also took the helm of the family's business, Conveyors of North America. She is the mother of four fine children, Joseph, Mary Jo, Tommy, and Jennifer. Likewise, Mayor Kolodziej has a strong commitment to civic activities. She continues to be a soloist and organist at the St. John Kanty and St. Paul's Roman Catholic Churches of Clifton; and is a member of many civic and charitable organizations throughout the Passaic County area.

Among her favorite civic activities is the Polish University Club. This organization, established in 1928, focuses on raising funds for students of Polish descent to continue their education. Since 1951, the scholarship fund has awarded over $100,000 to 180 students, an admirable record of achievement. Every year, the club honors one person who has done extensive work within the Polish community in New Jersey, and who has made every effort to insure that young people of Polish descent receive a quality education. On Saturday, February 4, 1989, Gloria Kolodziej will be honored by the Polish University Club as its Outstanding Citizen of the Year.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues would join me in congratulating the Honorable Gloria Kolodziej for her exemplary record as a public official, as well as for her work within the Polish community. I can think of few others so deserving of such an honor.

FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT WILL BE PASSED THIS YEAR

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to reintroduce the Family and Medical Leave Act. This is the third consecutive Congress to see the introduction of this bill, and I intend it to be the last. Approximately 4 million Americans are denied family and medical leave each year, and if last year's measure had been enacted they would be benefiting from it today. Over 130 of my colleagues are listed as original cosponsors, and we are firmly committed to passing the proposal this year.

This bill contains the same provisions as the bipartisan compromise measure that was reported out of the Education and Labor Committee last year. This compromise is a much more modest proposal than was originally introduced last year, and we feel it effectively addresses the needs and concerns of the business community. Those Republicans and Democrats that have supported the concept of family and medical leave have worked well together, and the bipartisan support established during the last Congress will be maintained in order to secure final passage of this act.

We need to act soon. It has become clear that now is the time to adopt this minimum Federal standard to provide workers the right and ability to care for their families. The Federal Government can no longer stand by and idly watch as millions of hard working American men and women are forced to choose between retaining their jobs and caring for their children, their parents or themselves. This modest proposal is a necessary step toward assuring fair treatment for all American workers.

The Family and Medical Leave Act would require employers to grant up to 10 weeks of unpaid family leave, within a 24-month period, upon the birth or adoption of a child or to care for a seriously ill child or parent; unpaid medical leave of up to 15 weeks in a 12-month period could be taken for an employee's own serious illness or injury. The bill exempts those employers having under 50 employees for the first 3 years and exempts employers with fewer than 35 employees thereafter. There will be a commission established to examine the impact of the bill on business. Also, to be eligible for leave, an individual must have been employed by the company for 1 year and must work a minimum number of hours.

Under the bill, all employees have the right to the same or equivalent position upon return to work and the continuation of preexisting health benefits during leave. This is extremely important because it is too often the case where an individual is promised leave by management only to return to a job with a much smaller salary or no job at all. Job security is fundamental to providing leave to an employee during a stressful period in his or her life and without this provision the leave that this bill calls for would be of little value to anyone.

The Family and Medical Leave Act is necessary and important profamily legislation. Public policy has moved too slowly to meet the changing needs of today's family. The supporters of the bill have a renewed and stregthened commitment to seeing the Family and Medical Leave Act signed into law this year, and I urge my colleagues to realize the repsonsibility this Congress has to the American worker and the American family.

PROHIBIT THE DISINVESTMENT OF THE OASDHI TRUST FUNDS

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the disinvestment of the OASDHI trust funds bill prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from disinvesting obligations held by the OASDHI trust funds in order to generate new borrowing authority and thereby circumvent the limit on the amount of public debt that the Treasury may carry by law. These provisions highlight and strengthen the intent of Congress that OASDHI assets count against the debt ceiling in the same fashion and to the same degree as debt instruments issued to external investors, and that OASDHI obligations may not be unilaterally canceled as a means of delaying the date the Treasury goes into default. It is the purpose of this legislation to reaffirm the principle that obligations issued to the OASDHI trust funds are only to be sold or redeemed if internal OASDHI trust fund shortfalls warrant drawing upon these reserves, and for no other reason.

In the months of September and October 1984, and September, October, and November 1985, the Secretary of the Treasury unilaterally canceled bonds held by the OASDHI trust funds as a method of converting internally held Government debt into new borrowing authority, and thus delaying the date the Government went into default. The extent of the disinvestment was substantial, amounting to the unilateral cancellation of $9.8 billion of OASDHI bonds in 1984 and $27.9 billion in 1985. The Congress subsequently passed legislation to assure that the funds would suffer no loss of principal or interest as a result of these disinvestment actions. The trust funds could have lost an estimated $440 million over 5 years for the actions taken in 1984, and between $1 and $2 billion for actions taken in 1985, respectively.

Legislation identical to the bill being introduced today passed the House by a vote of 401–0 in the 99th Congress as a part of H.R. 5050, a bill to make the Social Security Administration an independent agency.

ANTILIBERAL STANCE

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, I recently received a letter from Mr. Wyatt C. Williams, 2d national vice president of the National Alliance of Postal & Federal Employees. Mr. Williams enclosed a copy of an opinion. Mr. Williams addresses a problem which is of concern to his organization.

RESENT REPUBLICANS' ANTI-LIBERAL STANCE

(By Wyatt Williams)

Every female, blue collar worker, Afro-American and foreign-born American should resent the Republicans seemingly tainted image they are placing on liberals. Still further it is odd that President Reagan, once labeled a liberal and admirer of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Hubert Humphrey, and an early supporter of civil rights, would be the force behind this anti-liberal conservative agenda. His zeal and that of nominee Bush's drive to push this conservative agenda at times seems to be redbaiting and racist. For example on one occasion Reagan accused Democratic leadership of being so liberal until they had left the country. Nominee Bush, in his continuous reference to the Willie Horton case, seems to be associating black crime with the liberal movement. While knowing full well that black Americans are the greatest victims of crime, and white crime is equally heinous. I must assume such remarks are made for a devisive purpose.

It's easy to see how millions of white Americans of a liberal persuasion who believe in this democratic form of government would be pushed into a defensive posture, fearful of speaking out on liberal issues for fear of being branded as far left. Such tactics make me wonder if white America is going soft on democracy and leaning more toward the right wing fascist ideals. To me, liberalism is the cornerstone of democracy. To not believe in liberalism is to not believe in liberty, and to not believe in liberty is to have problems believing in our constitution. Thus, if it is the policy of the Republican party to win at any cost—even if it means reintroducing the spirit of McCarthyism back into American life—then I am indeed fearful for the future of democracy in America. The Republicans' continuous smearing and tainting of liberalism is to show disdain for democracy and a host of liberal legislation covering the young, the old; the black, the white; the male, the female; the sick, the disabled; the organized worker, the unorganized worker; the employed and the unemployed. It was the liberal movement that liberated the females from second-class citizenship giving them the right to vote and a chance to pursue an equal opportunity in all facets of American life. It liberated the blue collar worker from oppressive working conditions and gave them the right to organize, receive pensions, obtain medical benefits and a better wage. It opened the doors for millions of foreign-born, liberated Afro-Americans and other minorities; giving them the right to pursue the American Dream. If it is the Republican conservative agenda to steer clear of such liberal concerns, then it is time for all Americans to show concern for a Republican administration.

Their recent success in killing the increase in the minimum wage bill showed their strong leaning against the workers and toward the right. But the real danger in the Republicans' conservative agenda is its strong link-up with a host of new right and far right organizations including the Ku Klux Klan; all who seem to wrap themselves in the American flag. Which brings to mind that Huey Long once stated: that "If facism comes to America, it will be in a program of Americanism." The "Nation" indicates in its monthly edition that there is a collaboration between the Grand Old Party (G.O.P.), Old Nazis, the New Right and the Reagan administration. The "Nation" further indicates the Political Research Association makes it clear that the National Republican Heritage Groups Council is a cynical cover-up of the conservative label to mask the Republican link-up with the new right and far right, I'm further troubled by a seemingly hidden racist agenda being fostered by this conservative label. They seem to convey to white America the following: in addition to associating liberals with blacks in crime, they further seem to associate liberals with blacks on welfare and in public housing—even though the records show more whites on welfare, and in public subsidized housing.

To establish such polarization is certainly not good for the future of the two party system in the nation. former Congressman McDonald from Georgia, now deceased, a former right wing member of the John Birch Society and other right wing groups had stated the feeling of other right wing members when he indicated there is no need for a two party system. To hear such thinking makes me wonder what do they have in mind. Are they working toward a one party system? Could it be the forerunner of a fascist state? Are they using blacks in the same manner as the Nazis used the Jews? Certainly if the present divide and conquer tactics of white against black continues, then we won't be electing the best candidate based upon merit, but instead we will be electing the most pronounced racist. If that should be the course of our nation, then the only winners will be white Anglo Saxon males. While the reasoning may seem a bit farfetched, it's not impossible. Remember, the present administration has utilized its eight years in office establishing a racist line between blacks and whites by indicating that Affirmative Action was taking the jobs of whites even though the records proved otherwise. The records further showed that whites often benefited equally well from Affirmative Action; oftentimes it eliminated favoritism and cronyism. To white females went the greatest benefits of Affirmative Action, but nothing was made of it. Reagan himself appointed a minimum of blacks to federal positions and those who were appointed were those with controversial backgrounds left to public ridicule.

Under the present campaign the show goes on. Nominee Bush has stayed clear of Black Americans, selected few to run his campaign and attended the John Birch site while millions of Americans black and white celebrated the anniversary of democracy's greatest triumph: the Civil Rights March. However, I refuse to believe the Republicans will clone white America into a bunch of bigots.

BILL PROPOSED FOR HOUSING OPPORTUNITIES FOR LOW-INCOME AMERICANS AND PRESERVATION OF HISTORIC BUILDINGS

HON. RICHARD T. SCHULZE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, today Congresswoman KENNELLY and I, along with over 50 other Members of Congress, are introducing the Community Revitalization Tax Act of 1989. This bipartisan effort, when successful, will result in the creation of housing opportunities for low-income Americans and ensure the preservation of our Nation's historic buildings and architecture.

Our legislation removes the low-income housing credit and historic rehabilitation credit from the passive-loss tax rules enacted in 1986. It is a responsible and well-negotiated effort to allow the use of the credits for their intended purpose.

Our legislation is vitally needed. Investors are no longer building low-income housing, thus shortages are appearing nationally. Historic rehabilitation applications in Pennsylvania dropped 81 percent between 1985 and 1988.

Mr. Speaker, our legislation may well end up as one of the key housing initiatives of the year and I urge my colleagues to cosponsor the bill.

"CONGRESSMAN BUD"

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to everyone's attention an article by Jonathan Rowe which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of November 7, 1988, concerning an unnamed colleague of ours in the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while our courtly, thoughtful, fastidious colleague is not named in the story, I am certain that all Members of the House—except perhaps for newly sworn Members of the 101st Congress—will have no trouble identifying this quintessential gentleman.

It is fitting and appropriate that a Representative from the Commonwealth of Kentucky place the following article in the RECORD, and I am proud to do so:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, Nov. 7, 1988]

A COURTLY CONGRESSMAN

(By Jonathan Rowe)

After 10 years in Washington, I was only vaguely aware of this man, through an occasional story in the Washington Post. I'll call him Congressman Bud. I first encountered him at a briefing session for newly elected congressmen. I was there as legislative assistant to such a "freshman," as they are called. Bud was there to brief us on congressional decorum.

He semed like a man from another era. Sunday blue suit, courtly manner, gray hair parted meticulously near the middle, bespeaking a desire to be proper rather than to be noticed. I remember thinking how much he resembled my grandfather, who wore a suit even to baseball games on hot summer afternoons.

Bud talked about the civilities that House members traditionally extend to one another, such as addressing each other as "my esteemed colleague." (A disputatious House member once declared that he held a colleague in "minimum high esteem.") He counseled that such lubricants eased the flow of business in what could easily become a raucous and unwieldly chamber.

But I had come to Congress for combat, not courtesies. As I sat in that ornate committee room, I envisioned myself drafting bold new legislation, working craftily behind the scenes, writing speeches that would bring the chamber to its feet. Bud seemed quaintly irrelevant to the grand crusades that I imagined ahead.

I didn't see much of him in the months that followed. (Nor did I see much of the crusades. Freshman congressmen keep their mouths shut. Their staffs write speeches for the Congressional Record and answer the mail.) Then, one Friday afternoon I strolled over to a garage near Capitol Hill to pick up my car, which was in for repairs.

It was one of those sweltering summer days that, before air conditioning, caused the Capitol to shut down until fall. Exhaust fumes from commuters, blending with the oppressive heat, turned the foot of the Hill into a basin of misery.

The garage almost seemed to have congealed out of the desultory air. From the street, one easily might have thought it abandoned. The office area was not much different. The owner was a short, bald man who at times seemed preoccupied with some unspoken grievance or hurt.

On this day, the man's mood was especially dark. He shuffled papers on his stand-up metal desk, totally ignoring me. For at least five minutes, he refused to acknowledge my presence. Was he irked, I wondered, that I had brought him an ancient Volkswagen that taxed his powers of repair?

Or was it something deeper? He was an intelligent man, at least 20 years my senior, with wife and family to support. Yet my pay was probably equal to his, if not greater, for work that to him must have seemed a lark. (In truth my work was probably less useful than his in the overall scheme of things.)

It isn't fair, I thought, how easy my generation has had it, compared with his. In Washington and other cities awash with overpaid young professionals, this must be painfully evident to people like this mechanic, and perhaps gallingly so. Whether he was actually thinking along these lines, of course I will never know. I tend to doubt it. But somehow, his silence evoked these feelings in me.

A car drove up to the gas pump, what might once have been called a "late-model sedan." The garage owner dropped his papers and hurried out the door. It was Congressman Bud.

Bud slid out of the driver's seat and greeted the man in his usual courteous fashion. Despite the sweltering heat, his white shirt was unwrinkled, and his tie was pulled properly to his neck. Bud's car was spotless. He probably kept a whisk broom and a chamois cloth in the glove compartment, the way my grandfather did.

They exchanged a few pleasantries while the man pumped the gas. Then he was gone.

When the garage owner returned to his cluttered office, he was suddenly cordial, expansive almost. "Wasn't that Congressman Bud?" I asked, fishing for an explanation.

"That's him," the man said. Then, without further prompting, he recounted the kindnesses that Congressman Bud had accorded him over the years.

"One day he says to me, 'Joe, your daughter is going to be starting college soon, isn't that right?' I told him yes, that was right. So then he says, 'Well, she's going to be needing a job to help her pay the tuition. Why don't you have her come by my office?"

Jobs are precious commodities on Capitol Hill. When bestowed as favors, it is generally to sons and daughters of key constituents or of House colleagues (who are not allowed to put family members on their own staffs). To give one to the daughter of a garage mechanic, one who isn't even a constituent, is not a daily occurrence.

Simply thinking about it seemed to dispel whatever had been eating at Joe.

I have since learned a few other things about Congressman Bud. He appears religiously for roll calls, reads the bills on which he votes (not all do), takes not a penny from political-action committees, corporate or otherwise.

We don't hear much about such quiet rectitude on the evening news. But it is people like Congressman Bud who provide the institutional glue that holds the House of Representatives—and other organizations—together.

That episode at the garage made me see my ambitions in a different light. Those who speak most passionately for "the People," whether from a left- or right-wing view, often seem too busy for the daily kindnesses that help people in particular. We disparage the old-style ward politicians. Yet they excelled in precisely such assistance.

"He's the finest man I have ever known," Joe said of Congressman Bud. I wonder how many of our ideologues, so sure they know what is right, impress in that manner the people they encounter when the cameras are still.

VULNERABILITY IS WHAT WORRIES VENTO

HON. MARTIN OLAV SABO

OF MINNESOTA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SABO. Mr. Speaker, we are all aware of the great problems facing our Nation's cities. Our challenge is to provide an adequate supply of affordable housing, access to health care, quality schools, a better wage for working people, and parental-leave and decent child care so parents can work and not fear for their children's safety.

The December 29, 1988 issue of "The Catholic Bulletin"—the newspaper of the Archdiocese of St. Paul and Minneapolis—contained a series of articles about "The Church in the Cities." It focused on the important role the church can play in dealing with these urban challenges. It discussed the responsibility all of us have to support cities and make them better places in which to live and work.

I would like to share with you one especially noteworthy article from that issue. It outlines our colleague BRUCE VENTO'S thoughts about the problems facing urban America.

Congressman VENTO has long been a leader on urban issues—especially those dealing with housing, the homeless, and our urban environment. He has worked tirelessly to improve the quality of life for city dwellers. BRUCE has the knowledge and depth of understanding needed to help meet our urban challenges. I think you will find BRUCE'S comments insightful. He hits the nail right on the head.

VULNERABILITY IS WHAT WORRIES VENTO

GOVERNMENT HAS ROLE . . . BUT CAN'T DO IT ALONE

In the neighborhood U.S. Rep. Bruce Vento grew up in St. Paul, half the parents today are single heads of households.

To Congressman Vento, the statistic typifies urban America's vulnerability, and urban America's needs.

Vento, a Catholic elected to a seventh consecutive term from St. Paul and its eastern suburbs, sees cities increasingly populated by the elderly who are vulnerable, by single heads of households who are vulnerable, and by a disproportionate percentage of minorities who are vulnerable.

"Some of the things people need in cities are minimal health benefits and minimum wages," Vento said. "Day care is discussed by almost everyone. Parental leave is important. If you're a single parent whose child is sick you have to have health care. They're saying I want the ability to take care of my child when he or she is sick. These are the types of questions vulnerable people have. These are real problems."

"Interestingly, though," Vento said, "one-third of all the people in this country still live in cities," and he questions if that one-third is getting its share of the federal dollar and the federal attention. "Anything we do in terms of programs, the national government has a role. We can't do it alone, but we can't abandon urban areas. We have to be there to maintain the vitality."

Those who are vulnerable put more demands on government, the congressman said. They can't do certain things themselves. As a result, they have a high call for social services and education.

What can't happen is for there to be a gap between the people who live in a city and the people who work there, he feels. And churches can play a role in that.

"It's important that institutions, whether it be the church or the science museum, be inclusive. They have to bring the vulnerable population into what they are doing.

"So often you see things like the World Trade Center or the IDS Center as being the focal points of cities. You have to bring people to see they are part of that."

Vento, however, didn't denigrate the flight to the suburbs; he also represents those areas, like Maplewood, where he belongs to Presentation of Mary parish. "The flight from the cities sometimes is white and sometimes its economic," he said "Let's face it, the suburbs can be nice places to live. The yards are bigger.

"But suburban residents have to some how relate to urban dwellers, they have to be sensitive to the needs of urban dwellers," and he saw churches already providing some of that kind of opportunity in outreach like the Loaves and Fishes program that brings people from all over the archdiocese to serve food to those in the inner city.

Vento noted that city governments themselves have become "entreprenurial," being the instigator behind business and commercial development. Most of the major building projects in the past 10 years in St. Paul, he observed, have received assistance from the city or the Port Authority, which is in fact the City Council.

"It's the cities that are making things happen, and when they do they can make certain requirements, like so many low-income people working on the job," Vento said. "They can have more of an advocacy role for the people who live in the city, and they do, and they should."

In order not to lose neighborhoods to deterioration, government has to give people a stake in their community, Vento said.

It has to battle the variety of elements that cause a disintegration of the social environment of neighborhoods and help create the sort of cooperation needed for people to make things work. Housing is a good place to start, he said. Community block grants and entitlement laws like Chapter One bring people together because they force people in an area to work together.

Vento said the new welfare reform bill proposes to provide things like job training, health care, day care so people who want to work can be sure their children are OK. "We're saying that as you find your way back into the mainstream of society, you're going to have your needs met," the congressman said.

A personal project of his has been preserving what is there of cultural and historic importance in cities and preserving some of the natural areas.

He's convinced the attractiveness of a city is a question of how the environment you live in looks. Housing can't be ramshackle, he said. Schools can't look like Dresden after World War II, a sight he was reminded of on a recent trip to New York.

The federal government won't be putting up more high-rise public housing projects which left people more vulnerable, but it does have to start replacing public housing he said, which has been slashed from the budget during the past eight years.

"Today you don't have all the support you used to find in the city from family. You have to try and meet those needs through other means," Vento said.

"We're trying to create some of the elements that are absent in an urban environment. National government, state government, and the private sector all have a role to play in that, and in good cities like St. Paul and Minneapolis, it's the city that's trying to bring all those groups together."

GOOD IDEAS, NOT ENOUGH DOLLARS

Good ideas for improving urban America exist, Congressman Bruce Vento said, and many have proven their value with terrific results. But they have been inadequately funded on the federal level, he said.

"We have the programs," Vento said. "The models are there.

"The main element is that most haven't been funded adequately."

Vento pointed to community block grants which are targeted at urban revitalization.

"We allocated $3 billion for community block grants last year, but that's not even a third of one percent of the budget."

Vento criticized the proposed purchase of 132 B-2 "Stealth" bombers at a cost of $516 million per plane.

"Some military spending is necessary," he said, "but the dollars we spend on those types of products means we don't have dollars for other things. I think the investment in people is an investment we get back."

CHALLENGE FEDERALISM

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, for almost a full century, the National Civic League has worked to improve State and local government.

The league believes that the change in Presidential administrations is in invitation to challenge the public and private sectors to get to work and get to work together.

Accordingly, the league chairman, former Mississippi Gov. William F. Winter, recently issued an 11-point challenge—11 recommendations to the State, local, and Federal Governments to work together to solve America's problems.

Governor Winter declared:

The challenge before us is to find the right mix of Federal, State, and local action by the public, private, and nonprofit sectors to aggressively tackle our domestic problems.

I am honored to share with my colleagues the National Civic League's "Challenge Federalism."

American federalism has been transformed in the 1980s. No longer does the national government play the dominant role it did from the 1930s through the 1970s. Instead we have witnessed a historic out-pouring of state and local initiatives in every area from economic development to school reform, child care to help for the homeless.

State and local governments are today true and co-equal partners in tending to the nation's business, in creating the sinews of a strong, productive and competitive country.

The reduced federal aid of the 1980s clearly hastened development of the new state and local activism. The twin deficits that exist today—in the federal budget, and in our balance of trade—preclude major new federal domestic initiatives well into the 1990s.

But governors, mayors, local elected officials, city managers and civic activists have exhibited immense ingenuity and initiative. In state after state, community after community, breakthroughs have only occurred when government accepted as collaborators and co-inventors a multiplicity of allies, from private corporations to citizen groups, foundations to universities.

Since its founding in 1894, the National Civic League has believed in the potential for more responsive and efficient government through full citizen participation. We applaud the new grassroots capacity for innovation and creative response because it is based on broad coalition and consensus building within the broader society, and by participatory decision making within government itself.

Public services are being more efficiently delivered when government agencies must compete with private sector firms, to see which can do the job most economically and effectively. By examining alternatives for service delivery, communities are both adapting to a changing environment and utilizing scarce public resources in a more effective manner.

Economic development is being furthered when states and localities invest in strategic planning that brings in all the stakeholders from businesses to neighborhood groups.

Governors, mayors, and county executives are finding they are often the most effective when they act as conveners rather than policy buccaneers. Major environmental and social conflicts are being resolved by new techniques of mediation, negotiation and consensus building.

State and local activities are increasingly future and investment oriented. They contribute to the nation's readiness for the next century through expenditures for child care and basic education, employment training, transportation, and critical physical infrastructure. Their economic development programs are already bolstering the nation's trade position by making the link between university laboratory research and actual commercial production.

The progress of state and local governments is not, however, uniform. From child poverty to teenage pregnancy to heavy levels of school drop-outs, from untended infrastructure to mediocre universities to non-delivering medical systems, the remaining challenges—directly for the states and localities, ultimately for America as a whole—remain enormous. The domestic security is as vital to the United States' future as its national security.

The President and Congress have an immense stake in healthy, innovative, effective states and localities. How can they help?

Do nothing to inhibit the remarkable wave of state and local innovation. Federal regulations, expenditures, and locational decisions should all be designed to let the states, cities and counties continue their entrepreneurial, imaginative new policy directions.

Encourage the free and rapid transfer of information about new and innovative policies and methods of service delivery at the state and local level. The federal government should not prescribe cookie-cutter solutions; in this variegated, continent-sized nation, few innovations will work everywhere. States and localities must remain free to customize new ideas and approaches for their special circumstances. But the federal government, through information systems, whether run by itself or private organizations, and by active technology-transfer programs, should help to inform and enliven the debate about potential new solutions and approaches.

Back state and local efforts that promise high quality, cost efficiency and effectiveness. The nation needs to use all its public dollars prudently, and strategically. Outcomes should be the important test, not how a state or local government achieves a specified end.

Redesign federal aid programs growing through state and local governments to leverage maximum private sector and philanthropic resources.

Redesign federal initiatives that in effect conscript state and local governments to provide services the federal government will not support itself. Instead, Washington should inaugurate a new form of challenge federalism in which, through matching or challenge grants on a substantially equal basis, it acts as a catalyst to encourage states and localities to invent and implement effective and equitable programs in areas ranging from homelessness to child abuse.

Encourage long-range, investment-oriented activities so that state and local governments can help to strengthen the national capacity into the decades ahead. Whether it is in early childhood education, job training, road building or affordable and low-income housing, those at the state and local level have a major role to play in preparing for the challenges of the future.

Target federal resources to states, communities, regions of America in the most need. Given the continuing problems of Southern poverty, for example, greater shares of federal matching money should be available to a lagging Mississippi than to a booming Connecticut. The recently passed welfare reform bill, based on successful models in the states, is a good example of national legislation that will be of special help to residents of poor inner-city and rural areas.

Engage the White House and Cabinet officers in regular, substantive policy planning discussions with state and county and local leaders, to devise joint solutions to shared problems. Federal officials, the Congress included, should understand that only through careful listening, and respect for the state and local leaders, will they be able to develop the most effective national policies.

Recognize and abet the business, foundation and university role in state- and local-level partnerships for more effective governance. Just as an economy requires a physical infrastructure of roads, bridges and buildings, a community requires a civic infrastructure of skills, processes and relationships needed to address the challenges of the future. The National Civic League has developed a National Civic Index specifically designed to assist communities in evaluating the strengths, and areas in need of improvement, in their own civic infrastructure.

Re-instill in Americans a faith in the capacity of government programs, well designed and well administered, to solve difficult problems. A prime example: Head Start, which social science research has shown makes a critical, long-term difference in allowing underprivileged children to develop into fully participating members of the society.

Speak up for America's civic life. The President, members of Congress and other leading federal officials should seek to promote and foster a national sense of community and a broader sense of citizenship and its responsibilities—beyond voting and paying one's taxes to taking an active role in one's community, whether that service be in volunteer work, aiding a non-profit, starting a civic action league, or running for public office. The President should seek to make public service again an attractive goal for all Americans, either through career government service or, equally important, running for office one's self. Instead of entrenched incumbency, we need to restore in America the idea of the part-time, temporary citizen official, spending part of his or her career working for government, but maintaining strong roots in private life.

We believe our national government has an exciting opportunity to sustain the civic momentum behind America's newly energized state and local governments of the 1980s by mounting, within the next months, a collaborative, achievement-oriented challenge federalism for the 1990s.

THE NEED FOR DRUG TREATMENT

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, President Bush has acknowledged that drug education must be a cornerstone of the battle against the drug epidemic. While education is essential for preventing future generations from developing drug problems, we must not neglect the immediate and urgent task of drug treatment, helping those who already have a drug problem. Unfortunately, this approach has received little more than lipservice. Less than one-third of the new money authorized for drug treatment by the Omnibus Drug Initiative Act of 1988, for example, was appropriated for this year's programs.

When we condemn the use of illicit drugs, we have a moral obligation to extend a hand to those who are struggling to rid themselves of their addictions. Bolstering our drug treatment programs is also a pragmatic contribution to the costly battle against escalating drug-related crimes. By working with drug abusers to eliminate their expensive addictions, we may help prevent some individuals from committing crimes to support their habits.

A recent New York Times article tells the story of a man who committed a serious criminal act after having applied unsuccessfully to be admitted to a drug treatment program. He, like thousands of others seeking help for drug abuse problems, was put on a waiting list. Mr. Speaker, as we ready ourselves to continue the battle against drug abuse in the 101st Congress, I urge my colleagues to read and reflect upon the following article.

[From the New York Times, Jan. 27, 1989]

FOR DRUG ADDICT, SPOT AWAITS HIM, PROBABLY IN A JAIL

(By Michael Winerip)

BLAUVELT, N.Y.—If a drug addict says, "Yes, I'll take residential treatment," counselors want to grab him and throw him in a program, pronto. "The addict will say yes today—he'll say no tomorrow," said Kevin Frawley, who knows.

One Thursday in 1978 Mr. Frawley said yes. Two days later a counselor was walking him to a Daytop residential program. "As we walked I was trying to think of ways to get out of it," Mr. Frawley said. "I told him I wanted a few days to take care of private business—which there was none." The counselor kept marching Mr. Frawley forward. He took the bed and today runs a Daytop center here.

Last spring George Raetz, a 34-year-old, $400-a-week truck driver with a wife, two sons, a nice apartment and an 18-year drug habit, walked into the center here and told Mr. Frawley he wanted a bed. But Daytop—the state's largest drug treatment program—now has a three-month waiting list.

As weeks passed, Mr. Raetz kept using cocaine. Memorial Day weekend, he took his paycheck to New York City and spent it on cocaine. It wasn't enough. "I was strung out, I wanted more," Mr. Raetz said. He figured he could get away with stealing one purse. He couldn't. "Forty people were chasing me down the street," he said. The police arrested him.

He was charged with forcibly taking a purse, grand larceny, a felony. "I'll tell you how much of a criminal George is," Mr. Frawley said. "He signed a confession. He was crying at the police station." In a virtually identical incident, Mr. Raetz was convicted of purse snatching in 1986. If he is convicted this time (the trial is next week) he will go to prison.

Neither time was he armed. His criminal record is two misdemeanor drug possession arrests 15 years ago. "George is not a criminal," Mr. Frawley said, "He's an addict who needs a bed." Putting George Raetz in a prison bed will cost the state three times as much as George Raetz in a Daytop bed.

Has there ever been a time when politicians have talked as forcefully against drugs? Gov. Mario M. Cuomo made it a lead item in his budget message, President Bush in his inaugural speech. And yet experts in the field like Daytop's president, Msgr. William B. O'Brien, say financing for treatment—particularly long-term residential care—just isn't there. Mr. Cuomo's budget calls for 400 extra community beds; there are now 4,600 statewide. Even his aides admit this will not make much of a dent; the state's division of substance abuse estimates there are 260,000 heroin abusers in the state and another 620,000 "heavy abusers" of other drugs. But the Governor's people say it is the best he can do if he is to keep his pledge to cut taxes. "We see this as the initial foray into a major effort," said Michael Dowling, Mr. Cuomo's deputy secretary for human services.

Monsignor O'Brien, who started Daytop 25 years ago, said he was "dumbfounded" by the number of community beds. "We could fill all those tomorrow just from our waiting list—1,421." This is not his first disappointment. "We worked with Nancy Reagan on her husband's first campaign," he said. "She was here four times and was honored at a dinner. But after the election, the more involved she became in visiting centers, the more centers closed because of lack of funds. We've been estranged since 1982."

He was disappointed, too, by President Bush's comments that budget contraints limited how much more the Federal Government could do and that the private sector must do more. The Monsignor is as savvy a fundraiser as there is in the drug treatment business. William A. Schreyer, chairman of Merrill Lynch, and Frank P. Smeal, a partner at Goldman Sachs, are on his board. Last year they helped raise more than $2 million for Daytop.

Even so, more than half of Daytop's budget comes from state and Federal grants. The Monsignor knows trying to squeeze more from the private sector is not the answer.

Next week the Monsignor or one of his assistants will go before Judge Alfred Kleiman of State Supreme Court in Manhattan on behalf of George Raetz. With mandatory sentencing, they know the odds aren't good. Their best hope is that the Manhattan District Attorney's office might take pity.

Mr. Frawley can't count all the addicts he loses while they wait for beds. He runs a day outpatient program for teen-agers. "I let George come to the adolescent day program," he said, "so he has some place to go."

"I'm kind of the example for the kids," Mr. Raetz said. "The counselors say, 'George Raetz is somebody you don't want to be.' It doesn't feel good. I feel like an embarrassment."

A TRIBUTE TO NORTH CAROLINA'S ELIZABETH KOONTZ

HON. W.G. (BILL) HEFNER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. HEFNER. Mr. Speaker, on January 6, North Carolina lost a good friend and a national leader in education, civil rights, and the women's movement. Elizabeth Duncan Koontz, "Libby" to her friends, died at age 69, after a long illness. She leaves behind many friends and admirers across the Nation who knew her through her work as the president of the National Education Association and the top-ranking woman in President Nixon's administration, where she served as director of the Women's Bureau of the Labor Department.

For those of us in North Carolina, we also knew her a a caring neighbor, teacher, and active community leader. She spoke for many of us when she advocated improving opportunities for women, fought for civil rights, and promoted raising our educational standards.

She was a person of great commitment and great courage. Libby Koontz will be greatly missed.

I would like to share with you an article written by Rose Post of the Salisbury Post newspaper in my district.

[From the Salisbury Post, Jan. 6, 1989]

ELIZABETH KOONTZ, 69, DIES OF HEART ATTACK

(By Rose Post)

Elizabeth "Libby" Duncan Koontz, a national figure in education, civil rights and the women's movement for more than a quarter-century, died at 4:30 a.m. today.

Ill with cancer since early July, she died of a heart attack at her home at 418 S. Caldwell St. She was 69.

The funeral will be conducted Monday at 2 p.m. at St. Luke's Episcopal Church by the Rev. Mayo Little. Burial will be in Oakdale Cemetery. The body will be at Noble and Kelsey Funeral Home.

The youngest member of the large and prominent Duncan family which made a major impact on Salisbury and North Carolina and beyond, Mrs. Koontz began her career as a teacher of mentally handicapped children. She rose to prominence in 1968 as the first black president of the National Education Association. At that time its 1.1 million members made it the largest professional organization in the country and possibly the world.

She resigned less than a year later to become the top-ranking woman in the Nixon administration as director of the Women's Bureau in the Labor Department. The position required Senate confirmation and her boss was George H. Shultz, who was then secretary of labor.

Nixon, she said recently in a series of tapes she made shortly before her death to help document a changing America, chose her for the position because he got five in one—a woman, a black, a southerner, a Democrat, and an educator—and she accepted the position because she knew she could make more than a token impact.

And she knew she had done it.

She had to look no further, she said, than the top-ranking woman in the Reagan administration, Salisburian Elizabeth "Liddy" Dole, to see how far the country had come since the 1960s. Mrs. Dole's first cabinet position as secretary of transportation would have been considered "inappropriate" and not "women's work" two decades ago when Mrs. Koontz went to Washington vowing to make change.

Under her leadership, the Women's Bureau tackled the then current image of women's work, convincing the Labor Department to reverse its stand against the Equal Rights Amendment, getting insurance companies to recognize that men had health problems just as women did, and making women aware that they could not only choose from a full range of occupations, not just "woman's work," but needed to plan to continue to lead useful lives in other forums after their children grew up.

BROKE BARRIERS

Even-tempered, unpretentious, with a genuine caring smile that broke barriers of color and sex and an ability to speak even on formal occasions with an impact that seemed personal, she was convinced that change had to be made while people remained friends. And right up to her death she was more concerned about changes she'd help bring about.

But others have been quick to point to her impact on many occasions.

"She's one of the really remarkable people in North Carolina," William Friday, former president of the University of North Carolina, told The Post in late 1986, speaking from personal experience with her on a number of projects.

NATIONAL INFLUENCE

"Libby Koontz," he said, "has had a national influence on education and in North Carolina simply because she has worked hard and is a very thorough person."

Calling her a "great participator" who never hesitated to meet with students, he credited her with helping smooth the way for desegregation here and across the nation by calling on teachers to join together to ease racial tensions. She was instrumental in forming the N.C. Association of Educators, which brought black and white teachers together to pursue common goals.

Born June 3, 1919, she was the seventh child of Samuel and Lena Duncan, who were both educators. She always credited her parents with rearing their children to believe that people privileged to have an education were also obligated to be of service. And their children all were of service, growing up to become teachers, principals, and quiet movers and shakers. Her oldest brother, the late Dr. Samuel Duncan, was president of Livingstone College when he died, and the surviving Duncan child, John B. Duncan of Alexandria, Va., is a former commissioner of Washington, D.C.

Born across South Caldwell Street from the home in which she died, she was a 1935 graduate of Price High School and received her AB degree in English and elementary education at Livingstone College in 1938. After two years as a teacher at Dunn, she received a master's degree in elementary education in 1941 from Atlanta University in Atlanta, Ga., and did further study at Columbia University in New York, Indiana University at Bloomington and North Carolina College.

She taught in Winston-Salem from 1942 until 1945 when she returned to Salisbury for 20 years in local classrooms. During that time she became active in professional organizations and took her first leave of absence from the local school system in 1965 to become president of the Association of Classroom Teachers of the National Education Association.

She became NEA president in 1968 and went from there to the Women's bureau position, which she held until 1973, when she returned to North Carolina as special assistant in the North Carolina Department of Human Resources working with coordination of nutrition programs.

In 1975 she was named U.S. delegate to the United Nations' Commission on the Status of Women, which was responsible for the resolution on the International Women's Year observance in 1975 and served on the U.S. Department of State's Selection Board for Foreign Service Officers.

Later that year she was named assistant state superintendent of the North Carolina Department of Public Instruction in Raleigh.

Always considering Salisbury her home, she returned here to live when she retired in 1982.

An active member of numerous organizations, she was recognized with honorary memberships in many others and received honorary degrees from more than two dozen colleges and universities across the nation.

She served on many boards, including service as vice chairman of the Commission on North Carolina Year 2000, as a trustee Educational Testing Service in Princeton, N.J., the University of North Carolina at Charlotte, and Pfeiffer College.

In 1985, she was named one of North Carolina's five distinguished women.

Her husband, Harry Koontz, a coach and teacher at the former Dunbar High School in East Spencer, died April 21, 1986.

In addition to her brother, she is survived by a foster sister, Alvia Wilson Barfield of Los Angeles, Calif. Deedee Wright of Atlanta, Ga., made her home with Mrs. Koontz.

TRIBUTE TO SCOUTING 102 OF LOWELLVILLE, OH

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a fine group of young men from my 17th Congressional District of Ohio. On February 5, 1989, "Scouting 102" of Lowellville, OH will be celebrating its 10th anniversary. It is with true pleasure that I stand today to honor the group and its leaders.

I had the opportunity to meet the members of Pack 102 and Troop 102 on their first trip to Washington in 1985, and I can truly say that I have never met a finer group of young men. They represent the type of youth that their parents and community can really be proud of. I am honored to serve as their Representative.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House to join me today in congratulating "Scouting 102" on their excellent record of dedicated service to the young people of Lowellville. I would also like to extend to them our best wishes for continued success in the future of their program. May their next 10 years be as successful as their first 10.

THE ACCOLADES FOR RONALD REAGAN CONTINUE

HON. GERALD B.H. SOLOMON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, the office of President of the United States has often seemed too big for the men who have filled it. But Ronald Reagan measured up to the job by never losing his optimism and good nature. He made America feel good about itself for the first time in a generation.

The special magic that was Ronald Reagan's was summarized in a short caption in a recent magazine review of 1988. It is entitled "Into the Sunset," and it reminds us that Mr. Reagan was every bit as big as the job he held longer than any President since Eisenhower. It is my pleasure to enter this accolade into today's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF WAYNE GREENFIELD

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reintroduce a bill for the relief of a constituent of mine, Mr. Wayne Greenfield, of Pacific Grove, CA, who I believe is entitled to compensation for losses he has suffered as a result of actions of the Bureau of Land Management in the Department of the Interior. I have introduced this bill in the past because I truly believe in its merits.

Many constituents approach me and request that I introduce private legislation to assist them with a problem they are having with the Federal Government. I take these requests very seriously for two reasons. First, it is clear that by the time these constituents come to me and request private legislation they have spent a great deal of time trying to solve their problem themselves, but have been unable to reach a favorable solution. For this reason, I take these requests seriously. Second, I believe that private legislation should be used only as a last resort and in cases where it can be helpful. In the case of Mr. Wayne Greenfield, I feel that private legislation is appropriate and necessary. I would like to take a moment to explain Mr. Greenfield's problem.

On October 25, 1965, Mr. Greenfield purchased 22½ acres of land from a private party. The boundaries of the purchased property were established by a Bureau of Land Management survey in 1963 and were recorded in the appropriate county courthouse in California. On October 21, 1974, Mr. Greenfield purchased 42½ acres of land by bid from a superior court sale of private property. Again, the boundaries of the property were based on the 1963 Bureau of Land Management survey. In 1979, the Bureau of Land management resurveyed the property in question which resulted in the loss of approximately 5 acres of Mr. Greenfield's property. The lost property had a value of about $20,000, including timber and land value, and the value of two active springs. As a result of the same survey, Mr. Greenfield acquired some additional land. However, this land was worth only $5,000, leaving Mr. Greenfield with an unfair loss in land value of about $15,000.

I believe that Mr. Greenfield's loss is a result of mistaken actions by the Bureau of Land Management, and that his case warrants the pursuit of private legislation to redress his loss. I urge my colleagues to review the merits of this measure and grant him the necessary relief.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress Assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $15,000 to Wayne Greenfield of Pacific Grove, California, in full settlement of all claims of Wayne Greenfield against the United States for damages caused by an incorrect survey by the Bureau of Land Management of the Department of the Interior.

SEC. 2. Not more than 10 percent of the sum appropriated in the first section of this Act shall be paid to or received by any agent or attorney as consideration for any services rendered in connection with the claim specified by this Act, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Violation of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000.

TRIBUTE TO WOODLAWN ELEMENTARY SCHOOL

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. THOMAS A. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to join the U.S. Department of Education in recognizing Woodlawn Elementary School for excellence in education and in congratulating the people of Woodlawn for this honor.

Educating the youngsters of our Nation is no small or straightforward task. The faculty and parents of Woodlawn have demonstrated that they truly care for the future movers and shakers of the world. This is the most impressionable age of our chidren, and I feel very confident and assured that the Woodlawn children are under capable supervision.

The majority of students at Woodlawn Elementary School score at or above their respective grade levels on standardized tests. Programs such as the chapter 1 project, summer school, mathematics lab, and instructional television are examples of how Woodlawn has attacked the diverse problems and situations with which they have faced as a school in today's changing world.

The school's theme "A Reader is a Leader," exemplifies that their intentions are sound and will be fulfilled when the school continues along this path.

The Woodlawn Elementary School is a deserving recipient of membership in the 1988 National Elementary School Recognition Program, and I wish them all the best for the coming years as well.

CHARTER FOR THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SOCIAL INSURANCE

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the charter for the National Academy of Social Insurance bill introduced today would authorize the granting of a Federal charter for the National Academy of Social Insurance.

Founded as a non-profit, bipartisan organization, the National Academy was created to promote a greater understanding of Social Security as a social insurance program. In addition, the Academy provides valuable information about the workings of the programs included in the original Social Security Act, as well as related programs under the auspices of the act.

The Academy, a resource center for current social insurance experts, facilitates an active exchange of ideas among the experts, as well as students undertaking advanced study of social insurance issues, Members of Congress and their staffs, and those representing groups in the policymaking process.

The National Academy of Social Insurance hopes to increase the opportunity for the public to learn about social insurance programs through its public awareness initiative which includes an information clearinghouse, a speaker referral service, and public forums.

PATIENT DUMPING

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing the Medicare Hospital Patient Protection Amendments of 1989 to protect hospital patients from improper transfer for economic reasons. My bill will build on prior legislation I have introduced and the Congress has enacted to assure that patients in need of emergency care are not dumped from one hospital to another.

Patient dumping is a disgracefully common practice. It is simply not acceptable to kick desperately ill people from one hospital to another because they cannot pay the bill.

Far too many Americans are subjected to what is termed a "wallet biopsy" when they come or are brought to an emergency room seeking treatment. If immediate proof of ability to pay is not forthcoming, the patient is transferred to another facility, even though the transfer may threaten the life of the patient.

In 1986 the Congress adopted legislation which requires all Medicare-participating hospitals to provide necessary medical examinations and treatment to stabilize individuals with emergency conditions, and women in active labor. After the patient is stabilized, the hospital may provide for appropriate transfer to another facility.

The transfer of patients from one hospital emergency room to another is a common practive and appears to be growing. During the past five years, several studies have found that patient transfers have increased dramatically. One study in Dallas found transfers had increased from 70 per month in 1982 to more than 200 per month in 1983. Another found an increase from 169 per year in 1981 to 930 per year in 1985 in Washington, DC, and another for Chicago found in increase from 1,295 per year in 1980 to 5,652 per year in 1984.

A number of studies have described the patients who are dumped. A 1984 study, from my own area, at Highland Hospital, a public hospital in Oakland, CA, found that of 458 patients transferred, 63 percent had no health insurance. Another study at Parkland Hospital in Dallas found that 77 percent of those transferred did not have insurance. At Cook County Hospital in Chicago, 87 percent of those transferred lacked adequate health insurance.

Patient dumping is but a symptom of a much larger problem. Thirty-seven million Americans are without health insurance. Low income sick people are finding it increasingly difficult to get needed health care and the burden of caring for them is falling on fewer and fewer hospitals. Hospitals are providing over $8 billion per year in uncompensated care.

I am sympathetic to the problems hospitals face in caring for the indigent. I have introduced legislation to mandate health insurance for every working American, to provide direct assistance to hospitals providing large volumes of charity care, and to assure fair rates of payment under the Medicaid program. I have stated repeatedly that we need to provide fair and adequate reimbursement to hospitals for every patient they serve, particularly as we attempt to slow the rate of growth in Medicare and private health insurance expenditures for hospital care.

However, my sympathy for the problem which hospitals face does not, in my view, relieve hospitals of their responsibility to care for emergency patients.

I would hope that the antidumping statute would be self-enforcing and that hospitals will take steps to assure that they never transfer an unstable patient or a women in active labor. However, in those cases where the callous action of a hospital or physician requires enforcement, I believe that the amendments I am proposing today will assist in assuring proper prosecution of the law.

Attached is an article from the Wall Street Journal which describes many of the problems my bill will address:

DESPITE FEDERAL LAW, HOSPITALS STILL REJECT SICK WHO CAN'T PAY—ACUTELY ILL ARE TRANSFERRED, TURNED AWAY AT THE DOOR; CLOSED EMERGENCY ROOMS—PERILS THE UNDERINSURED FACE

(By Clare Ansberry)

Since August 1986, it has been clearly illegal for hospitals to dump the poor. But that didn't save Terry Takewell.

Just a month after the federal law took effect, the 21-year-old diabetic became acutely ill. His neighbors in a small trailer park in Somerville, Tenn., found the young man panting and drenched with sweat from a fever. An ambulance sped him to nearby Methodist Hospital, where the uninsured carpenter already had an outstanding bill of $9,400; a directive in the emergency room told staff members to alert hospital supervisors if Mr. Takewell ever returned.

He was in a hospital bed when an administrator arrived. After speaking to Mr. Takewell briefly, the administrator helped him to his feet and escorted him to the parking lot. Neighbors found him there under a tree and took him home; he died about 12 hours later.

Zettie Mae Hill testified at a congressional hearing last year that she is still torn, wondering whether Mr. Takewell would be alive today if she and other neighbors had directed his ambulance to a different hospital. "We didn't believe the hospital would just let a person die like that for lack of money," she said.

THE HOSPITAL'S ACCOUNT

For its part, the hospital contended that Mr. Takewell left of his own accord. Investigated under the new federal law, the hospital was absolved of any wrongdoing. But that finding outraged at least one attorney, Gordon Bonnyman of Legal Services of Middle Tennessee. "You couldn't find a more unbelievable case, yet nothing was done," he says. "That gives you an idea of how effective the law is."

Each year, despite statutes against the practice, hospitals dump—that is, transfer for economic, not medical, reasons—an estimated 250,000 people. Neither anti-dumping laws—federal, state and local—nor the nation's health-care system has overcome market pressure to shun many of the estimated 37 million Americans who have no health-insurance coverage.

Increasingly, they are pariahs, rejected by a system determined to contain medical costs. And while hospitals talk about aiding the sick poor—and many, in fact, do—few welcome the responsibility. Nor do doctors, insurers, employers or Congress.

That helps explain a Chattanooga, Tenn., hospital dispatcher who told an ambulance crew not to bring in an unconscious man found in a poor neighborhood—because, he said, the administrator "would kill us if we took another indigent."

NO OBLIGATION TO PAY

Michael Krentz, the president of the American College of Emergency Physicians, says: "On the one hand, we have a moral, ethical and legal obligation to see a patient. Nobody, on the other hand, has a moral or legal obligation to pay for that care."

The thorny issue came up in the recent presidential campaign. Gov. Michael Dukakis said he wanted employers to provide minimum health-insurance benefits, while Vice President George Bush opposed the idea on the ground that it would increase the cost of doing business and thwart job growth.

Still, a growing number of authorities agree something must be done. The venerable National Academy of Sciences Institute of Medicine contends in a recent study that health care to the indigent is as critical as the AIDS crisis.

In the past, hospitals passed the costs of charity care along to patients covered by insurance. But now insurers have established limits and will pay only so much for any given hospital procedure. Governments are stingier with Medicaid and Medicare payments, too. Fewer than two of five poor Americans are covered by Medicaid today, down from 65% a decade ago. California has dropped 250,000 of the working poor from its Medicaid program.

ABSORBING THE COST

Unable to weather the cuts, more and more cash-poor hospitals are closing, leaving a smaller pool of mostly public and nonprofit hospitals to absorb the annual cost of uncompensated care. Joseph Denney, an admissions official at the Ohio State University Hospital, says he is writing letters of protest to more than 15 Ohio hospitals that have transferred indigents to his institution. He wants them to "do their fair share."

Health-industry officials say that laying the blame for dumping the poor isn't all that easy. "You can't just say those are bad hospitals are dumping people and are morally deficient," says J.B. Silvers, the management professor at Case Western Reserve University's Health Systems Management Center. "Facing deficits, they must ask: 'Do you squeeze on the commercial side where people pay, or do you squeeze on the social side?'"

The health-care system is more on choosing the latter course, and over dumping is the most graphic consequence. Some 15 million Americans are either denied care or don't seek it because they can't afford it, according to a study by Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. And numbers are growing each year, the research group reports.

If hospitals don't frankly turn away the uninsured, they will sometimes close their emergency rooms, refuse Medicaid patients, or require payment in advance. "They may lock their doors on the side of the street facing a poor neighborhood," says Mr. Silvers. "It's not actual dumping, but it's the same thing—denying access."

SHUNNING SERIOUS ILLNESSES

In Tennessee, Arthur Kellermann, who heads emergency services at Memphis's Regional Medical Center, says the human cost in pain and suffering is all too frequently ignored in the push to contain medical costs: "We aren't talking about a patient with no money who wants a tummy tuck or a face lift. We are talking about heart attacks and seizures and strokes and gastrointestinal bleeding."

The major push against dumping came two years ago when Congress proscribed it. Under federal law, hospitals doing business with Medicare must treat patients with emergency conditions and all women in active labor, regardless of their ability to pay.

But although the law was praised for acknowledging that problems exist, it has also been criticized as largely ineffective. Enforcement regulations have yet to be adopted. Moreover, the law's terms are nebulous. For example, patients must be "stabilized" before being transferred. But, notes Judith Waxman, an attorney with the National Health Law Project: "One doctor's stabilized is another doctor's dump."

Last year in St. Louis, a young uninsured woman, five months pregnant, arrived at a hospital complaining of stomach pains. She was about to be transferred when she gave birth. The baby was stillborn. The hospital proceeded to transfer the woman—dead baby, umbilical cord and all. In Chicago, patients considered to be "stable" and thus transferable included a gunshot victim bleeding profusely from an artery to the brain and a man who had fallen from a third-story window.

IN THE DARK

If most Americans don't even know that an anti-dumping law exists, perhaps it is because no one is required to tell them about it. Even those doctors and hospitals receiving the dumped patients are reluctant to report violations or to move to stop them for fear of souring their relationships with other institutions.

Those who do often are ostracized. Ron Anderson, president and chief executive of Dallas's Parkland Memorial Hospital, says he was warned by peers that he would never find another job in hospital administration in Texas after he advocated a state anti-dumping law. And Dr. David Ansell of Chicago's Cook County Hospital says his own hospital held a press conference to rebut his study showing a threefold increase in dumping there.

Ignorance of the law and evident reluctance to report violations help explain why the federal Health Care Financing Administration has found only 61 hospitals among several thousand in the U.S. to have violated the 1986 law. Just two hospitals have been booted out of the Medicare program as a result. Legal Services' Mr. Bonnyman says the problem is more pervasive than it seems. Federal authorities, he says, rely on politically sensitive state boards to rule on complaints. The Takewell case, for instance, was considered by a state licensing board dominated by representatives of hospitals.

"There is a built-in conflict of interest that absolutely undermines the enforcement of the law," he claims.

THE IMPERILED UNDERINSURED

While dumping is most closely associated with the uninsured, the country's 50 million underinsured are at risk as well. Consider 61-year-old Mary Marshall, whose symptoms—a 104.8-degree fever, dehydration and hallucinations—caused her family to seek hospitalization. A private Tennessee hospital was prepared to admit her—that is, until it discovered she didn't have group insurance and her own policy provided inadequate coverage. She was told she needed to pay $1,200 out of pocket and was sent home when she couldn't come up with the money. Later, her family took her to a local public hospital, and she was admitted there.

"The private hospital treated her like she didn't have any insurance at all," says Mrs. Marshall's daughter Judy Wilkerson. "If you don't have money, you're nothing."

A few states—notably Texas and California—have attacked the dumping problem with their own strict laws and vigorous enforcement. The Texas state attorney general's office is suing Humana Hospital Corp. in Harris County State District Court. The complaint alleges that Humana's Clear Lake Hospital dumped Mary Rourke, a 47-year-old housewife. Mrs. Rourke was admitted to the institution for a prescription-drug overdose and then was transferred to a public hospital—against the advice of the receiving doctor—because she has no insurance. While she was in transit, Mrs. Rourke's heart stopped. Resuscitated, she became comatose. She died without regaining consciousness. A Humana spokesman says he can't discuss details of the matter because it is in litigation but adds: "Certainly, we are defending the case."

NOW, "REVERSE DUMPING"

Cases such as Mrs. Rourke's are declining in Texas, and officials there credit the state's anti-dumping law. But now they are observing a new phenomenon: "reverse dumping," in which larger hospitals refuse to accept uninsured patients from smaller, less sophisticated ones.

Edwin Norris, the administrator of tiny Culberson County Hospital, which is situated on a desolate stretch of flat Texas highway, spent four hours begging hospitals to take an indigent man whose leg had been all but amputated by a train. Because the small hospital lacks surgical facilities, doctors there couldn't even finish the job of cutting off the leg. "We just tried to make him comfortable until we finally found someone to take him," says Mr. Norris.

In another remote Texas town, a 17-year-old gunshot victim spent hours in a small hospital while nurses frantically tried to find a large hospital and neurosurgeon to take him. None would, so the family was told to hire an ambulance to take him to the emergency room of a large hospital, McAllen Medical Center. By then, critical hours had passed, and the boy eventually died.

California also is seeing end-runs around its strict laws. Some hospitals in the Los Angeles area, for example, are threatening to close unprofitable emergency rooms to all but private ambulances.

"One way or another, people aren't getting needed health care because they don't have enough money to buy it," says Lois Salisbury, an attorney with Public Advocates in San Francisco who helped lead the fight for an anti-dumping law. "The problem persists in new forms and outpaces . . . legislators."

Another "sordid variation of dumping," she says, consists of admitting and summarily releasing the uninsured after a quick once-over. Last year, an uninsured 27-year-old truck driver was admitted to a California hospital after persuading officials to accept $596 instead of the $1,000 they requested. The man, who had chest pains, was released the next day even though basic tests hadn't been conducted, Ms. Salisbury says. He was told to rest for a week and not lift anything heavy. Several hours later, the man died.

Ms. Salisbury believes hospitals will continue to find ways to avoid caring for the indigent until they get their money. The question is: how to reimburse them. Some health-care experts advocate creating a pool of funds from insurers and those hospitals that don't treat many poor patients to compensate hospitals that do. Others say new taxes, such as an income-based health-insurance tax, will finance care. National health insurance is yet another possible course.

Whatever the solution, it promises to be financially painful, says Ms. Salisbury. Without a remedy, however, the casualties will increase among the sick and families unable to afford proper care.

The legal-aid attorney recalls the torment of a young mother whose son was injured in an automobile accident in Modesto, Calif. The family was told it had to pay, up front, for surgery. It didn't have the money, and the boy died. "The mother was distraught with guilt," says Ms. Salisbury. "She and her husband were working class, but they just couldn't come up with $1,000 to try to save their son's life. That's what they must live with for the rest of their life."

A summary of the bill follows:

SUMMARY—MEDICARE HOSPITAL PATIENT PROTECTION AMENDMENTS

I. SCOPE OF HOSPITAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR SCREENING

a. The amendment clarifies that a hospital's responsibility for initial treatment of emergency patients relates to the hospital's entire capabilities, not just the capacity of its emergency room.

b. Clarifies that necessary treatment may not be delayed in order to assess patient's financial capability.

II. AUTHORIZATION FOR PATIENT TRANSFERS

a. Informed Consent: Clarifies that individuals requesting transfer to another hospital must give written informed consent and that hospitals must make reasonable effort to obtain informed consent from persons who refuse appropriate transfer;

b. Physician Authorization: Clarifies that a qualified person other than a physician may authorize a transfer only in direct consultation with a physician, for example via telephone;

c. Standard for Authorizing Transfer:

—Clarifies that the standard for appropriate transfer is that the risk of transfer to the individual or an unborn child is outweighed by the benefit of treatment at another facility. Also clarifies that risk during transfer must be taken into account.

—Clarifies that transferring facility must provide whatever treatment is within its capability prior to transfer in order to reduce risk of transfer.

—Requires transferring hospital to outline risks and benefits of transfer on records it sends with patient.

III. NOTICE AND RECORD-KEEPING REQUIREMENTS

a. Requiring Maintenance of Records: Clarifies which records must be maintained and requires hospitals to maintain records of transfers to and from the hospital as a condition of participation;

b. Requiring Posting of Obligations: Requires hospitals to post a sign specifying rights of individuals under this section.

IV. ENFORCEMENT

a. Hospital Liability: Clarifies hospital liability by deleting the requirement that hospitals "knowingly and willfully" violate the law;

b. Physician Liability: Clarifies physician liability by making clear that liability extends to attending physicians as well as staff physicians and by specifying that a physician is liable if he or she (i) refuses to provide a medically appropriate examination; (ii) falsifies the result of any examination, test, or other procedure in order to misrepresent an individual medical condition; (iii) makes a false certification; (iv) authorizes a transfer without certification; or, (v) misrepresents an individual's condition in order to induce them to consent to transfer.

c. Civil Enforcement: Clarifies that any individual who is the subject of a violation may recover damages in a civil action against the hospital or a responsible physician. Clarifies amount and scope of damages.

V. ADDITIONAL OBLIGATION ON HOSPITALS WITH SPECIALIZED FACILITIES

a. Requires hospitals with specialized facilities such as burn units, shock-trauma units, neonatal intensive care units, etc. to accept patients needing such services.

VI. MEDICARE CONDITIONS OF PARTICIPATION

a. Requires hospitals as a condition of participation in Medicare to adopt and enforce a policy to ensure compliance with the requirements of this section and to maintain records.

VII. EFFECTIVE DATE

180 days after the date of enactment.

FASTENER QUALITY ASSURANCE ACT OF 1989

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the American economy annually uses billions of screws, nuts, bolts, and washers for purposes too numerous to list. Most of us take them for granted as we go about our daily business. But the growing sale and use of counterfeit, mismarked, and substandard fasteners—in nuclear plants, bridges, high-rise building, motor vehicles, airplanes, military equipment, and dozens of other critical applications—has created an enormous national safety program.

The implications of this problem for our economy and national defense are as frightening as they are staggering. Fastener failures have wasted millions of tax dollars and degraded our military readiness. Moreover, American businesses and governmental agencies have had to expend huge sums of money purging their inventories of these bogus bolts and protecting themselves from potential liability for fasteners already installed.

Sadly, the fastener problem has an all too human dimension. Permit me to quote from a December 5, 1988, letter that I received from Mrs. Calvin Davis, the widow of an ironworker who was killed just before Christmas 1987 as the direct result of a substandard fastener used in a structural steel application in Tennessee. This poignant letter speaks for itself.

GAINESBORO, TN.

CONGRESSMAN DINGELL: I have been meaning to write you for several months now but it's not easy to keep reviewing the circumstances surrounding my husband's accidental death last December 22nd, '87 at the construction site of the new Saturn Plant in Springhill, Tennessee.

I received a copy of the report on the findings that the committee investigated and that you chaired. There have been numerous articles written and printed on this issue of defective bolts/fasteners during the past year and I am enclosing the latest one about Tommy Grant of Houston, Texas. I, of course, support his efforts 100% and only hope that if there is anything humanly possible that you can do to speed the needed legislation to put a stop to these coming into the States, please do so.

What I am trying to relate to you is how much my husband loved his family over all else and what a great loss we are all experiencing. I truly hope that no other family will experience what we have because of an accident involving more defective bolts.

May God give you the wisdom and strength to continue the struggle to achieve legislation that will protect our men and women who make this great nation of ours. It's appalling to think that we will import and use a defective bolt in this country knowing very well that Japan, for one, will not allow these same fasteners to be used in their country. I always thought we were the smartest people on earth but again the almighty dollar won out, didn't it?

Sincerely,

Mrs. CALVIN B. DAVIS.

Happily, a similar disaster was narrowly averted during the construction of a new bulk mail facility in Los Angeles in October 1987, when an earthquake sheared substandard fasteners holding steel beams in place and concrete assemblies weighing nearly 100 tons fell to locations where construction workers had been toiling only hours before.

To address this critical problem, I am today introducing the Fastener Quality Assurance Act of 1989 with 40 of my colleagues as cosponsors. The bill would require the testing and inspection of fasteners intended for critical uses to ensure that every lot conforms to the standards and specifications to which it was allegedly manufactured. The legislation does not involve the Federal Government in writing product standards, but it does require those engaged in the fastener business to adhere to existing and well-established private industry standards and provides enforcement mechanisms that are now sorely lacking.

This legislation is a refined and improved version of H.R. 5051, which my colleagues and I introduced last year. The changes are the direct result of extensive consultations with representatives of all elements of the fastener industry. I sincerely appreciate their cooperation and believe that the industry has demonstrated its desire to eliminate the quality and substitution problems that have so plagued us in recent years. I invite my colleagues to become cosponsors of this important and much-needed legislation, and I look forward to its prompt enactment. For my colleagues' information, I am inserting in the RECORD a section-by-section analysis of the bill.

PUT MORE INTO CIVILIAN R&D

HON. VIC FAZIO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to an article written by Senator J. BENNETT JOHNSTON, the chairman of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee and chairman of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Energy and Water Development, which was printed on January 8, 1989, in the New York Times. The article is titled, "Make Allies Share Defense: Put More Into Civilan R&D" and is an important statement on research and development which the House of Representatives should seriously review.

The State of California is a leader in domestic research and development. Unfortunately, the United States is drifting behind many of our international competitors in basic and applied research and development. Due to cautious R&D priorities over the last 8 years, the United States may find itself unable to maintain our markets both domestically and overseas.

The Johnston article maintains that the administration's narrow ideological constraints on commercialization of technology, may have permitted Japan to take the lead in the commercialization of ceramics, fuel cells, and photovoltaics. The 1988 fiscal year was the first time that both the Japanese and German Governments have surpassed the United States in photovoltaics research and development, a technology which was created by the United States Space Program in the 1960's. By the 1980's, the United States developed a domestic energy industry with over $100 million in annual sales, with over 65 percent of the technology manufactured exported overseas.

The Federal Photovoltaics R&D Program is a microcosm of the problems confronting the United States in all high-technology areas.

First, the U.S. Federal R&D support dropped from $151 million in fiscal year 1981 to $35 million in fiscal year 1989.

Second, our industrial competitors, sensing a lack of U.S. resolve, increased their own federal photovoltaics R&D programs. The result is that the potential multibillion dollar world markets that might have been dominated by the United States, may become controlled by our international competitors.

Third, our private investment markets appear risk-adverse to support the entrance of new technologies into the marketplace. Our international competitors seem more willing to direct both government and private sector investment to support the development and commercialization of new technology.

The United States needs to invest in our future. Increasing domestic research and development both by the Federal Government and the private sector is essential. If we don't, the United States may fall irrevocably behind, and the consequences could adversely effect economic growth, personal income, and employment for decades. I encourage all Members to seriously consider the article by Senator JOHNSTON. Thank you, Mr. Speaker:

MAKE ALLIES SHARE DEFENSE: PUT MORE INTO CIVILIAN R&D

(By Bennett Johnston)

WASHINGTON.—The 101st Congress will likely challenge the Bush Administration to spend less overseas to defend our allies and more to defend our own economic future. The alternative is to witness a continued erosion not only in commercial competitiveness but in our military-industrial base as well.

The problem is this: We are allocating an ever larger share of Federal research and development to defense—defense of our trading partners along with ourselves. This enables our partners to plow proportionately more money into civilian research and development.

Unquestionably, Washington pays more than its fair share of the costs of defending the free world. Defense Department figures show we spend $1,164 per capita on the military, while West Germany spends $454 and Japan only $163. We still pay to keep an overseas force of one million, the majority being civilians and dependents, not troops.

The adverse impact of this burden is becoming increasingly evident. Since 1981, Federal spending for civilian research and development has dropped 27 percent in real terms, compared with a 78 percent rise for the military. In the previous 15 years, R&D was split about equally between civilian and military purposes. Today, we spend about half as much on civilian research and development (including NASA) as on military.

Specifically, 69 percent of Federal R&D is now devoted to defense. The corresponding figure for Japan is only 4.5 percent and for West Germany 12.5 percent, according to the National Science Foundation. Moreover, as a percentage of gross national product, Japan and West Germany each spend half again as much as the United States on civilian technology, public and private.

In the past, military technologies spun off a host of civilian products, such as computers, semiconductors and commercial jetliners. But today the spinoff has reversed direction. Commercial technology is now driving military innovation.

Finally, the huge increase in military R&D in the Reagan years went far more into development than into research. Funding for the development of specific weapons increased in real terms by 73 percent between 1981 and 1987. But spending for military research known as "technology base" rose in real terms by a minute 0.3 percent in that period.

How did we reach this point? First, in the budget squeeze on civilian agencies, research and development was an early victim.

Second, Administration spending on R&D has been driven by a narrow ideology of leaving commercial decisions to the marketplace. Generally, if Government-supported research produces a technology with some commercial potential, Administration ideology dictates a cutback. As a result, we tend to produce ideas that other nations, particularly Japan, then develop into such new products as advanced ceramics, fuel cells and photovoltaics. The Bush administration should temper this rigid ideology with common sense.

Perhaps worst of all, a commercial sector that becomes uncompetitive eventually withers away and is unavailable as a military-industrial base. Thus, ironically enough, the Defense Science Board just released a report urging the Defense Department to take a larger lead in rejuvenating the civilian technical base.

While the problem is clear, solutions are more difficult to discern. Without new revenues the Government, especially the Defense Department, can little afford to boost civilian R&D; tax credits to spur corporate research and development have proved difficult to target on vital technologies. And a more militarized Japan is suspect.

However, our trading partners can compensate us more for the defense we provide them. That compensation might help relieve budgetary pressure and enable us to fund civilian R&D at the higher levels, as a percentage of the gross national product that prevailed in the past.

The new administration must restore a balance between civilian and military R&D and more equitably share our defense burden with trading partners whose future competitiveness we now subsidize. Not only trade but our future national security is at stake.

CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO ROCCO J. MARANO, CHAIRMAN OF BELLCORE, RECIPIENT OF THE NEW JERSEY SCIENCE-TECHNOLOGY MEDAL

HON. ROBERT A. ROE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pride and admiration that I rise today to salute an outstanding New Jerseyite and a truly great American whose foresight, dedication, and unparalleled leadership have led to some of the most important breakthroughs ever made in telecommunications research and engineering. I am speaking of Rocco J. Marano, the president of Bellcore of New Jersey, a research and engineering firm which today, under Rocco Marano's dynamic leadership, stands at the cutting edge of rapidly developing communications technologies.

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Science, Space, and Technology Committee, I firmly believe that the future of our great Nation is directly dependent on our ability to remain a world leader in developing and harnessing the rapidly evolving technologies that will dominate our world in the years, decades, and centuries to come. In this regard, Rocco

J. Marano, who established Bellcore 5 years ago as a means of providing centralized technical research support to the divested Bell Telephone companies, has made an enormous contribution to this Nation and to mankind.

For the visionary leadership which has been directly responsible for Bellcore's many critically important achievements, Rocco J. Marano was recently awarded the prestigious New Jersey Science-Technology Medal by the Research Development Council of New Jersey. I know this high honor brought great pride, not just to his many colleagues and all of those associated with Bellcore, but also to his fine family; his wife, Mary; his daughter, Susan; his sons, Thomas, John, and Peter Marano, and his daughter-in-law, Elena.

For the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert an article from the October 23, 1988, edition of the Newark Star-Ledger which recounts some of the major accomplishments which led to this great honor being bestowed on Rocco Marano:

[From the Sunday Star-Ledger, Oct. 23, 1988]

BELLCORE PRESIDENT WILL BE AWARDED JERSEY SCIENCE-TECHNOLOGY MEDAL

(By Kitta MacPherson)

Bellcore President Rocco Marano, credited with adeptly managing technology leading to several scientific advances, has been selected to receive the 1988 New Jersey Science-Technology Medal.

The award, bestowed annually by the Research and Development Council of New Jersey, will be given to Marano at a dinner celebration Nov. 30 at the Short Hills Hilton.

"The award recognizes the critical role of management in bringing discovery from the laboratory to the marketplace," said John Sibilia, chairman of the council.

"In particular, we are recognizing Mr. Marano's contributions in providing a central technological resource for the separate Bell operating companies, resulting in many scientific advances."

Several breakthroughs in telecommunications research and engineering have been achieved at the Livingston-based Bellcore under the management of Marano.

In 1985, Bellcore scientist broke the combined speed-and-distance record for transmission of data over single-mode fiber, using light-emitting diodes to transmit 560 megabits per second of information over about 15 miles.

A record was achieved once again in 1987 when nearly 27 gigabits per second of information—the equivalent of more than 400,000 simultaneous conversations—traveled on one fiber using multiple lasers.

During the same period, Bellcore was responsible for much of the fundamental research planning and engineering work in the evolution of today's telecommunications networks toward emerging high-speed entities known as Integrated Services Digital Networks (ISDNs).

Bellcore scientists have also been involved in superconductivity research, making significant developments in faster and simpler ways of making thin superconducting films, and a new process for optimizing the superconducting properties of the new materials during the making of microelectronic devices and circuits.

Marano is credited with steering Bellcore through a difficult course since 1984, when it was created through the AT&T phone divestiture as a "mini Bell Labs" for the Bell operating companies.

"With the dramatic restructuring and reorganization of the nation's telecommunications system in 1984, the Bell operating companies lost the precious technical resources of Bell Laboratories and Western Electric," said Dr. Stanley Bergen, chairman of the nominating committee and president of the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey.

"The nation needed a new central organization to help preserve the integrity of its communications system and to provide support and research for the regional operating companies. Bellcore has filled that need and it succeeded brilliantly, thanks to Rocco Marano and the people he recruited for his company."

Marano began his career in 1953 with New York Telephone, part of the former Bell System, after graduating from Fordham University's School of Business and Fordham Law School.

He changed positions several times over the next few years between New York Telephone and New Jersey Bell.

In 1982, he accepted a vice presidency with AT&T. During these predivestiture years, Marano began planning and implementing a Central Services Organization (later renamed Bellcore), assuming its presidency in 1984.

In addition to executive duties, Marano serves on the New Jersey Commission on Science and Technology and is chairman of the Partnership for New Jersey. He is a former trustee of Fordham University, a member of the Seton 150 Commission, and a director of Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Co., First Fidelity Bank, N.A., First Fidelity Bancorporation, and Blue Cross/Blue Shield of New Jersey.

The Research and Development Council of New Jersey is a nonprofit organization that was formed more than 20 years ago by leaders in science, business and the industrial community.

Its goal is to cultivate an environment that supports the advancement of research and development activity throughout the state.

Recent winners of the award include: Last year's recipient, Edward L. Hennessy, chairman of Allied Signal, Inc.; Carlyle Caldwell, chairman emeritus of National Starch and Chemical; and Merck & Company's chairman and chief executive officer, P. Roy Vagelos.

Mr. Speaker, along with his many other professional and personal pursuits, Rocco Marano has also been vigorously involved in numerous important community and civic pursuits. He served as chairman of Leadership New Jersey, an organization which encourages citizens of New Jersey to interest themselves in public service, and he is a member of Governor Kean's Business Round Table and the New Jersey Academy, a group of distinguished citizens, including past Governors, who "celebrate New Jersey achievers of the past, present, and future." On a national level, he was appointed by President Reagan in 1982 to the National Security Telecommunications Advisory Committee, serving as chairman in 1988, and in 1981 he was chairman of the Italian Earthquake Relief Committee.

Along with his numerous other contributions to his community, Rocco Marano has also served as New Jersey Industrial Chairman of the U.S. Savings Bond Committee, as a member of the Committee of the Laity of the Newark Catholic Archdiocese and as president of the Northeast Region, Boy Scouts of America. In 1984, Pope John Paul II named him a Knights of St. Gregory the Great.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to present a portrait of an outstanding New Jerseyite and a great American whose unsurpassed leadership has led to technological advances that will be felt in every corner of the globe, Rocco J. Marano, president of Bellcore and recipient of the New Jersey Science-Technology Medal. Truly, he has made our Nation and our world a better place to live.

THE FSX: GOOD DEAL OR DOUBLECROSS?

HON. DOUG BEREUTER

OF NEBRASKA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, this Member shares the concerns of many of his colleagues about the recently concluded memorandum of understanding between the Governments of the United States and Japan covering the transfer of F-16 technology to Japan for the FSX fighter aircraft project.

Although General Dynamics, the manufacturer of the F-16, will receive about $480 million in compensation from the Japanese for its participation in the development phase of the FSX and will be able to use any technology developed by the Japanese based on the F-16 free of charge, Japanese willingness to share development—and coproduction—work came only after long and tough negotiations. From the American perspective, it would have been preferable for the Japanese to have bought F-16s, or comparable American fighter aircraft, off-the-shelf. Japanese willingness to do this would have gone a long way toward assuaging United States concerns about its trade imbalance with Japan and the equitable sharing of defense costs.

A recent New York Times editorial. "The Losing Fighter Deal with Japan," summarizes many of the negative aspects of the deal, while a January 29 Washington Post article, "Giving Japan a Handout," provides a comprehensive account of the agreement and makes some practical suggestions to overcome its deficiencies. This is a serious issue, and, if the project goes forward, it could become a test case in United States-Japanese industrial cooperation. I encourage my colleagues to read these two pieces carefully as they become familiar with the pros and cons of this important issue involving the transfer of military technology to a close, non-NATO ally and trade competitor.

THE LOSING FIGHTER DEAL WITH JAPAN

An American negotiating team trying to sell F-16 fighters to Japan was defeated last month and is now in Tokyo to receive its second humiliation.

Japan wants to buy 140 new fighter planes. General Dynamics makes the world's best fighter, the F-16, in numbers that assure unmatchable economy. Furthermore, by buying American, Japan could reduce the trade surplus that so aggravates its major trading partner and help alleviate the burden America bears in defending, among other countries, Japan.

Surely in this case, Japan will buy American, no? No. Japan prefers to develop the FSX, loosely patterned on the F-16, at more than twice the cost. In an agreement signed last month in Tokyo by the retiring Ambassador, Mike Mansfield, General Dynamics has been designated a subcontractor, with a promise of 35 to 45 percent of the development work. In gratitude, the company will hand over all the necessary F-16 technology.

Has the Defense Department given away the store? Its negotiators worked harder than it looks. At first the Japanese insisted on developing a wholly new fighter. The Pentagon finally induced Japan to base the plane on the F-16. New technology developed for the FSX will be made available to the U.S. for military though not commercial use.

Still, the deal is one-sided and unfair. Japan shuts out American companies when it wishes to develop a new industry. Japan's insistence on developing the FSX may not relate to its effort to build up its aviation industry. Even so, the rejection of a superior American product seems familiar, and unfair.

Japan argues that defense is in a special category, and it is quite true that many countries like to build their own major weapons systems. But Japan and America have a special relationship. They are major trading partners; America shoulders the heavier part of their mutual defense, spending 6.5 percent of its gross national product on defense compared with Japan's 1 percent. The resources America diverts to defense have a lot to do with the trade imbalance that so benefits Japan.

The Defense Department, having agreed that Japan will develop most of the FSX, has now sent a team to Tokyo to plead for a share of the production contract. Agreeing to that seems the least Japan could do.

In the case of the F-16, the United States had every reason to expect that Japan would want to buy American, and every reason to be disappointed at the grudging concessions Japan has made to the two countries' common interests.

GIVING JAPAN A HANDOUT—WHY FORK OVER $7 BILLION IN AIRCRAFT TECHNOLOGY?

(By Clyde V. Prestowitz)

First it was TV sets, then VCRs, then semiconductors. Now, unless Congress and the administration act quickly, the United States will shortly give Japan a big boost toward its long-sought goal; leadership in aircraft manufacture, one of the last areas of American high-technology dominance.

A few days ago, General Dynamics signed a licensing agreement under which—despite its technological superiority—it will become a subcontractor to Japan's Mitsubishi Heavy Industries in a so-called co-development project to create Japan's next-generation "FSX" fighter.

The administration must now process an export license and notify Congress. If neither Congress nor the affected federal agencies raise an objection within 30 days, the deal will go through. Before it does, we should pause and reconsider. This agreement may not be in the best interests of the United States for a number of reasons:

By diverting scarce Japanese defense dollars (Japan spends only 1 percent of its GNP on defense) from immediate procurement needs into a 10-year project, the deal will increase the U.S. burden in defending Japan. It does not provide the most cost-effective defense for either country.

The deal is being done with practically no consideration of its potential long-term impact on the competitive capability of U.S. industry or of its possible exacerbation of the U.S. trade deficit with Japan.

It will transfer technology developed at great expense to U.S. taxpayers at very low cost to a country whose primary interest is not defense but catching up with America in aircraft and other high-technology industries.

The fighter deal is typical of a broader problem in America's relationship with Japan. When dealing with Tokyo on trade issues, the United States is a pussycat. Too often, our government and corporate officials act as if there's something wrong about bargaining hard to maintain America's economic position in the world. In our anxiety about offending the Japense, we're ready to give away the store. The Japanese don't bargain that way. They seek to protect their nation's economic interests. And so should we.

Under the General Dynamics-Mitsubishi arrangement, the GD-built F16, currently one of the Air Force's hottest fighters, will be stripped and virtually redesigned into a new fighter for deployment by Japan's Defense Agency (JDA) in the late 1990s. General Dynamics will provide all the technology—developed at an estimated cost of $7 billion from designing, producing and improving the F16 over the years. In addition, because GD is a competitor in the Air Force's latest development program (the advanced tactical fighter) and knowledge is fluid within the company, it is likely that some technology from the ATF program will also be transferred.

This is what General Dynamics will get in return: $440 million in subcontracting work from Mitsubishi on four development prototypes, possibly a share of component manufacture for eventual production of 130 planes, a possible transfer of allegedly advanced Japanese radar and composite-wing technology and possible royalties on future production of $75-$150 million.

The deal originated in the late '70s with a Japanese plan to replace its old fighters with new U.S.-made models in the mid-1980s. But soon thereafter, with Japan's growing emphasis on technological independence, the idea evolved into a plan to develop a Japanese plane from scratch. By 1985, the JDA had cut its original (and prohibitive) cost estimates by half and claimed that developing its own FSX would cost the same as buying from America.

Analysts in both countries were skeptical. In several meetings during 1986 and 1987—as the U.S. trade deficit with Japan neared $50 billion—Pentagon officials and American industry experts told the Japanese that the United States had three planes (the F18, F15 and F16) that could perform the required missions faster, cheaper and better. Alternatively, if Japan would not buy U.S. planes outright, they argued, it would still be better to produce slightly modified versions under license rather than reinvent the wheel.

In the spring of 1987 (as the U.S. Navy began to patrol the Persian Gulf, from which most of Japan's oil comes), the JDA again rejected the U.S. proposals in favor of self-development. While warning Japan that its attitude could harm relations between the two countries, U.S. officials compromised further, proposing "co-development"—which turned out to mean design modifications so extensive as to constitute virtually a new airplane. Successful compromise. But Japan's noted aerospace analyst Eiichiro Sekigawa said in Tokyo that "Japanese industry got most of what it wanted. In the end 80 percent will be Japanese."

Proponents of the agreement in the departments of State and Defense have been touting it as a breakthrough and a model for future projects. Among the advantages they cite: It will maintain U.S. influence and deter Japan from becoming a leading independent aircraft producer by denying it the experience of developing a plane entirely on its own. It will improve defense capabilities by yielding a better plane than Japan could make on its own, and get U.S. industry 40 percent of the development work and a piece of the eventual $8 billion production expenditure instead of nothing. It will also give us access to advanced Japanese technology and develop cooperative industrial relationships that will ensure continuing access and cost-sharing in the future. And it will do all this at no risk to American industry because the U.S. contribution is "mostly old technology."

Critics, however, argue that technology is only old if you already have it. Since the Japanese do not, infusion of U.S. technology can only spur rather than delay Japan's advance. The deal may yield a better plane than Japan could have made. But the U.S. could have done that itself.

The other putative benefits of the deal are tentative. Although GD's $440 million subcontract is supposed to be 40 percent of the development budget, both Japanese and American analysts believe that budget to be underestimated by half or more. Thus GD's share may be less than 20 percent.

Moreover, whether GD will get any of the eventual production run depends on Japan's evaluation of the prototypes. If they are found unacceptable, Japan could cancel the deal, take the technology and go on to build its own FSX as it planned originally. But even with a "go" on production, GD's share is subject to negotiations after prototype evaluation. Industry experts in both countries are skeptical that the JDA, which has been the main force behind development of the Japanese aircraft industry, will give GD more than a few bones.

There is also serious doubt as to whether the advertised Japanese technology is genuinely advanced—and whether GD will get it if it is. Industry experts are unanimous in the view that U.S. firms such as McDonnell-Douglas, Lockheed and Boeing are the world leaders in composite-materials technology. The Air Force's top composite engineer, Ted Reinhardt (who was consulted on the deal only last month after three years of negotiation had brought it near conclusion), says that on the basis of what the Japanese showed his people, they are far behind U.S. companies. In addition, even if Mitsubishi does have something interesting, GD officials have told the Pentagon that the company would have to build at least six of the 14 planned test wings in order to benefit from Japanese composite technology. But under the agreement, GD will be making only four.

Finally, because Japan doesn't make advanced jet engines, the plane will have to be powered by engines from either Pratt & Whitney or General Electric. The criteria for selection will likely involve how willing either company is to transfer "hot-section" and digital fuel-pump technology.

Thus, say the critics, in the worst-case scenario the United States could be creating a powerful competitor in its best export industry for a relative pittance in subcontract fees. And even if GD gets a substantial amount of eventual production work, the turn to the United States will be far less than if we had sold Japan our planes or licensed their manufacture there.

Ultimately, however, the issue is much broader. It goes to the heart of the U.S. relationship with Japan. To ensure the best defense for that country, both supporters and critics of the GD-MHI arrangement agree on a number of points: Japan needs a fighter now rather than eight to 10 years from now, when the FSX will become available; the specifications for the FSX are far more demanding than necessary to perform most of its presumed missions; the same specs make it less than optimal for other probable missions; three existing U.S. planes can perform all possible missions and can do them now or in the near future; the U.S. planes would cost half to a third as much as developing and producing the FSX; interoperability of U.S. and Japanese aircraft is highly desirable, but cannot be obtained with the FSX.

Two obvious questions arise. First: Why would Japan, when it is under immense international pressure to share more of the defense burden, choose a course that will waste scarce resources in both countries, aggravate the trade problem and still provide a suboptimal defense? And second: Why would the United States cooperate in such an undertaking?

The answer to the first question was given by Koichi Kato, a leading Japanese politician and former Japan Defense Agency head, in a recent conversation with U.S. trade officials. Japan's main objective, he said, is to achieve a competitive capability in the aircraft industry. This is no surprise. For over 30 years, Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry, which must approve all of JDA's aircraft procurement, has targeted development of a domestic aircraft industry. Cost and quality of defense have always been secondary issues.

The U.S. attitude is harder to explain, particularly in the light of prior experience. In 1982 the General Accounting Office published an evaluation of an earlier co-production agreement whereby MHI has been producing the F15 under license from McDonnell-Douglas since 1978. The report concluded that whereas the United States' primary objective was to secure an optimal defense, Japan's was to obtain technology in pursuit of industrial leadership. One executive told the GAO: "We were paid to put them in business and we gave them everything we had." The report emphasized that in the future the United States should give full consideration to the long-term economic consequences of its short-term military transfers.

This is the heart of the problem. The United States, unwilling or unable to interfere with the industrial policies of major allies (though it did kill Israel's planned Lavi fighter), is also more concerned with defense considerations than with long-term planning and is unprepared to accept the higher costs and inferior weapons that such policies entail. U.S. officials appear to believe that half a loaf is better than none, that if it can't persuade allies to refrain from certain developments, then the next best thing is for us to participate. But this automatically gives the initiative to the allies, whose highest priority is often industrial development. They set the terms and we put ourselves in the position of, in effect, begging to be allowed to get involved by donating our leading-edge technology. As a result, the half-loaf we end up getting may actually be worse than none.

Of course, there is nothing wrong with Japan developing its own aircraft industry. That is their business. But the U.S. should not be more concerned with Japan's defense than Japan is. Nor should it be more solicitous of Japanese industry than its own.

Some members of Congress are becoming increasingly concerned with this problem. Last week, Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) announced his opposition to the FSX deal. Sen. Alan Dixon (D-Ill) is also opposed. During Secretary of State James Baker's confirmation hearings, Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) asked the nominee if he would consider delaying approval of the deal. Baker said he would review the matter. And when Bingaman asked Secretary of Defense-designate John Tower about it, Tower expressed "some apprehensions."

In reviewing the agreement, the new administration and the Congress might propose the following. First, that Japan bridge the defense gap by buying 50 F16s or F18s immediately, either off the shelf or with relatively minor modifications. Second, that a substantial royalty be charged for provision of F16 technology. How much? The amount might be suggested by the fact that to develop its own technology Japan is willing to pay at least twice what it would cost to buy a U.S. plane. Third, that GD and MHI be co-prime contractors. And finally, that it be agreed now that 50 percent of eventual production will be done in each country.

Even if nothing is done in this case, a new policy is urgently needed to handle other trade agreements on the horizon. The Pentagon has said the F16 deal is a model for the future. Already there is talk in Japan of producing the AWACS aircraft (licenses to which we do not even grant to the British) and advanced helicopters. And discussions are now progressing in Seoul on a deal whereby GD would license the F16 to Korean industry and assist in setting up a production line.

That raises a fascinatingly ironic possibility: One day we may see the Koreans using American technology to out-compete the Japanese.

A BILL FOR THE RELIEF OF THOMAS J. SCANLON

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reintroduce legislation for the relief of Mr. Thomas J. Scanlon for the loss of personal property while in the service of the U.S. Government.

Mr. Scanlon, who presently resides in my congressional district, served as an economic commercial officer attached to the U.S. Embassy in Reykjavik, Iceland, in the fall of 1979. On September 10, 1979, Mr. Scanlon was directed by the U.S. Ambassador Richard A. Ericson to meet two Federal Aviation Agency [FAA] consultants arriving at Keflavik Airport the following morning and transport them to the Embassy. The sole purpose of the trip was to pick up the FAA officials.

Unable to secure a Government car for the trip, Mr. Scanlon was forced to rely on his own car, a 1977 Mercedes-Benz sedan. On the morning of September 11, 1979, while on the way to Keflavik Airport, Mr. Scanlon's car struck a patch of ice causing it to travel out of control and over an embankment. Damage to the car was beyond repair. The car, estimated to have been worth $9,400, was not insured against an accident of that kind.

Accordingly, Mr. Scanlon filed a claim with the claims section of the State Department's Office of Operations for the loss of his car. Investigations conducted by both local police and the State Department held that the accident was not the result of any negligence on the part of Mr. Scanlon. The claims section, however, denied Mr. Scanlon's claim on the basis of a provision [Paragraph 315F of volume 6] of the Foreign Affairs Manual which states that employee claims are not payable for any damages or loss of a privately owned motor vehicle incident to its operation. Mr. Scanlon, then, appealed the decision to the employee's grievance board. This appeal was denied on the ground that the board lacked jurisdiction to overturn the original decision of the claims section of the State Department.

While Mr. Scanlon seeks to recover only the small value of the car, $9,400, it is important to remember the financial impact the loss of a family car can have. In addition, you must remember that Mr. Scanlon's car was lost while being used for the benefit of the U.S. Government and not as the result of negligence, making his claim all the more compelling.

Congress has traditionally offered citizens, after all avenues of administrative recourse have been exhausted, a final means of resolving claims with the U.S. Government. We ought not allow an arbitrary regulation to prevent a dedicated public servant from recovering the loss of personal property destroyed while in the service of the U.S. Government. I urge my colleagues to grant Mr. Scanlon this relief.

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas J. Scanlon of Monterey, California, the sum of $9,400, which sum represents the uncompensated loss of personal property sustained by Mr. Scanlon on September 11, 1979, while assigned to the United States Embassy in Reykjavik, Iceland.

(b) The payment made pursuant to subsection (a) shall be in full satisfaction of all claims which Mr. Scanlon has against the United States for compensation for the loss described in subsection (a).

SEC. 2. No part of the amount provided for in the first section of this Act in excess of 10 per centum thereof shall be paid to or received by any agent or attorney on account of services rendered in connection with the claim described in the first section, and the payment or receipt in excess of 10 per centum of the amount provided for in the first section shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Violation of the provisions of this section is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not to exceed $1,000.

TRIBUTE TO THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE GUIDE

HON. ROBERT A. BORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Guide, a weekly community newspaper which has performed a vital service to its readership in Kensington and Port Richmond since its birth in 1939. Kensington, Harrowgate, and Port Richmond are three of Philadelphia's proudest neighborhoods, and the Guide has invested 50 years in building that community pride and spirit in its readership.

The Guide was founded in 1939 by Kensington native Ralph Mitosky, as a weekly advertising paper. By the early 1940's the Guide had begun its commitment to the neighborhoods it served, by publishing special columns from each area, such as "Juniata Jottings" and "Richmondites."

In 1946, Ralph Mitosky hired the man who would edit the Guide for 42 years, and counting, Matt McKinney. Matt immediately added columns devoted to women and sports, and began to run the "After Dark" column which has helped Guide readers choose their entertainment for years. Church events and local activities were publicized in the Guide, which increased their attendance, and reinforced the paper's role as the diary of its community.

The Guide has done much more than publicize events. Many of the best-known civic events in the area have been initiated and sponsored by the Guide: Softball leagues, trips, teen dances, free trips for youngsters, and the Kensington New Years Parade are all part of the Guide's investment in Kensington and Port Richmond. Showing real leadership, the Guide used its well-deserved reputation to lead on civic issues as well.

The Guide won its first great community battle in the late 1940's when it waged a successful campaign to keep Episcopal Hospital open and serving the neighborhood. During the last 40 years, the Guide has devoted many front pages to keeping vital hospital services in the community, and has conducted many campaigns to improve, unify, and benefit the community. Recently, the Guide gave its outspoken support to the "Kensington Pride" movement which has restored a tremendous community spirit in Kensington, Harrowgate, and Port Richmond.

In 1963, Ralph E. Mitosky died, and the Guide was jointly owned by his wife Dorothy Brooks Mitosky and Editor Matt McKinney. They sold the paper in 1977 to its current owners, H. Robert Jacobs, Sr., and H. Robert (Bob) Jacobs, Jr. The mix of new ownership with the experience of Matt McKinney has been a happy one for its readers. The Guide still has its finger on the pulse of its readers, and gives every sign of continuing to serve them well into the 21st century.

Mr. Speaker, I grew up in Harrowgate, reading the Guide, and my family and I have been enjoying it every week for as long as I can remember. Where I grew up, the Guide was always "the paper that mattered," and it still is. It has guided us well for 50 years, and I hope to still be reading it 50 years from now. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the 101st Congress join all of its readers in wishing a happy 50th birthday to the men and women of the Guide.

DISPARITY IN THE TREATMENT OF IMMIGRANTS

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, my attention has been called to the disparity in the treatment of immigrants who reach the mainland of Dade County and seek asylum from the manner in which immigrants who are approaching the mainland by ship and seek asylum under the laws of our land. This difference in treatment occurs when Immigration and Naturalization Service officials aboard Coast Guard vessels examine would-be immigrants coming in by ship while they are several miles offshore, where people other than Coast Guard personnel cannot be present. This procedure, which may be entirely justifiable from the Government's point of view, gives rise to the suspicion that the would-be immigrants, mostly black, coming in by ship are discriminated against. I have introduced a bill today to correct this disparity in the treatment of immigrants. All persons would have the same opportunity on the land, in the presence of witnesses, if desirable, to make their claims for immunity on the ground that they could not safely return to their homeland. I hope, therefore, that we can get this bill enacted and remove any justifiable fear that would-be immigrants approaching from the sea are to be treated differently from immigrants who reach Dade County and other parts of the country by land.

REMEMBERING LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate Lithuanian Independence Day, and to pay tribute to the brave people of Lithuania, who continue their struggle for freedom.

This year marks the 71st anniversary of Lithuanian independence. In the days following the Russian revolution, leaders of the Lithuanian people formed the Council of Lithuania, and declared the country to be an independent republic on February 16, 1918. For 2 years Lithuania fought with the new Soviet Government, until the Soviet Union signed a treaty ending the war and recognizing Lithuania as a sovereign nation.

In 1921 Lithuania joined the newly formed League of Nations, and like the rest of Europe, worked to rebuild their war-torn land. The Lithuanian Government successfully instituted a system of land reform, made education available to the masses, and promoted industrialization. Lithuanian culture flourished, with a particular emphasis on participation in the Catholic Church. But the independence of the Lithuanian people was to be short lived.

As the storms of war gathered in Europe, the Soviet Union and Nazi Germany signed a secret agreement dividing Eastern Europe in half, and allowing the Soviet annexation of Lithuania. This led to the Soviet invasion of Lithuania and the other Baltic States in 1940. What followed is one of the most tragic episodes in modern history. Under Soviet occupation, thousands of Lithuanians were executed. Hundreds of thousands were stripped of their land, their personal possessions, and were exiled to Siberia, most never to return. Lithuania was almost depopulated, with the land being turned over by the Soviet Government to people of Russian decent.

The United States has never recognized the incorporation of Lithuania into the Soviet Union, and continues to maintain diplomatic relations with representatives of the independent Lithuanian Government. By maintaining their unique cultural heritage, national language, and religious beliefs clearly distinct from the Soviet Union, Lithuanians have kept their deep historic roots and maintained their vibrant resolute spirit. As Americans, we understand the Lithuanians' desire for independence, and we support them in their continuing quest for freedom.

While Secretary Gorbachev has stated publicly that he is committed to a policy of greater regional sovereignty, true change has not been forthcoming. At this past summer's Communist Party meeting in Moscow, the Lithuanian delegation pushed for the adoption of a platform calling for greater economic, cultural, and national autonomy for Lithuania and the Baltic States, but their position was ignored.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot allow Lithuania's struggle to fade from our minds. The people of Lithuania have fought long and hard to attain what we Americans often take for granted; true independence and a guarantee of fundamental human rights. We must reaffirm our support for Lithuanians everywhere in their fight, and let the countries of the world know that we will continue to oppose the forces of tyranny and oppression.

THE STATE GRAIN FUND PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

HON. TERRY L. BRUCE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which will protect farmers, the Commodity Credit Corporation, and agribusiness lenders from severe financial losses resulting from the failure of a grain elevator.

For various reasons, grain elevators occasionally fail. When a grain elevator does fail, farmers are often the last in line to recover their losses. As an Illinois State senator, I sponsored a bill which established the Illinois Grain Insurance Fund. As insurance costs skyrocketed during the 1970's this proved to be the safest approach for both grain dealers and farmers. Other States have also taken similar action. Now, however, the integrity of such funds is in jeopardy due to a recent court decision.

A U.S. district court ruled that elevators that are federally licensed do not have to participate in State insurance funds. In many situations federally licensed elevators have opted to participate in State grain funds voluntarily—but some have not. In these situations, farmers would only be protected from inadequate Federal law.

It is obvious that the preemption of Federal law leaves holes in the coverage of State grain funds. If one rural community is vulnerable to a devastating financial misfortune it is necessary for Congress to take action.

The legislation that I am introducing will amend the U.S. Warehouse Act to allow States to require that all elevators participate in State grain funds whether they are licensed by the Federal Government or the State government. This will close the window of vulnerability.

This bill will not encroach upon the regulatory powers or duties of the U.S. Department of Agriculture or alter current State of Federal regulatory practices. Rather, it recognizes the traditional function of States to protect the welfare of their citizens.

Mr. Speaker, when agreeing to store grain in a local elevator a farmer accepts the possibility that for one reason or another, the elevator might go bankrupt. Also, a farmer expects that, like a bank, the elevator is insured sufficiently. State bonding requirements make this guarantee—Federal bonding requirements do not.

The State Grain Fund Protection Act of 1989 is an opportunity to demonstrate common sense and fairness to State grain funds, elevator operators, rural communities, and most importantly, our farmers.

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE DIRECT MEDICARE REIMBURSEMENT TO PSYCHOLOGISTS

HON. WILLIAM J. COYNE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing a bill that will provide direct Medicare reimbursement to psychologists. I view this legislation as a way to increase mental health care benefits to Medicare beneficiaries. Senator JAY ROCKEFELLER of West Virginia introduced the same measure in the other Chamber last Wednesday.

At present, mental health benefits under Medicare are very limited. With the exception of certain limited situations, Medicare allows only for direct reimbursement of the services of psychiatrists. However, the unfortunate reality is that there is a lack of psychiatrists in two-thirds of the Nation's counties.

My home State of Pennsylvania illustrates the problem. For example, according to the most recent statistics made available to me, there are nine counties that do not have psychiatrists; but do have psychologists. Data indicate that these counties have a disproportionate share of elderly individuals. Hence, many Medicare beneficiaries are denied access to the mental health care they need. The fact is that this bill is not without precedent—many private and Federal health carriers already cover psychologists' services.

Reimbursing psychologists directly under Medicare has received widespread support among those in the private sector. Those that have offered their support for this legislation include: National Association of Area Agencies on Aging, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Association of State Mental Health Program Directors, and the National Hispanic Council on Aging.

This bill respects the distinction between psychologists and psychiatrists. Neither I, nor any of those who support this legislation, wish to equate the two. Rather, I believe that both provide quality health care, and as such, Medicare beneficiaries should have equal access to both.

The additional new benefits have a small price tag. The latest CBO estimates reveal that the cost of this bill is slight. The net effect it would have on the Federal budget is estimated to be as follows:

[By year, in millions of dollars]

Net part B outlays:
First	10
Second	15
Third	20
Fourth	25
Fifth	25

These numbers translate to an average of 0.04 percent per year of total part B expenditures. Can we really deny such an important benefit when it is likely to cost less than one-tenth of 1 percent of yearly part B expenditures?

I believe it is critical that we do all that we can to improve access to mental health services. The legislation I am introducing today offers quality care at a reasonable price. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important measure.

HIGH SCHOOL RESERVE OFFICER TRAINING CORPS RECOGNITION DAY

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a resolution designating May 17, 1989, as "High School Reserve Officer Training Corps Recognition Day." In 1916 the Congress authorized the establishment of high school divisions of the Reserve Officer Training Corps providing a valuable and unique learning opportunity for hundreds of thousands of students. Today there are 1,495 Junior Reserve Officer Training Corps (JROTC) located in 46 States and, as part of the Department of Defense Dependent Schools, in the Caribbean, Pacific, Asia, and Europe. Hundreds of high schools around the Nation offer JROTC programs that concentrate on developing in their participants the desirable qualities of leadership, citizenship, teamwork, and individual initiative.

In my home State of New Mexico there are currently 18 JROTC programs in high schools across the State. In the Third Congressional District which I represent there are JROTC programs in Santa Fe, Espanola, and Fort Wingate. The communities of Penasco, Las Vegas, Taos, and Pojoaque are also very interested in including JROTC programs in their curriculum. The high school JROTC is a proven success in New Mexico and an integral part of the State's education system.

This year we celebrate the 73d anniversary of the establishment of high school divisions of the Reserve Officer Training Corps. I am introducing this resolution to bring national attention to a near quarter million young men and women across the Nation who proudly participate in the program. I believe it is appropriate to acknowledge and honor the contributions of the high school Reserve Officer Training Corps, its cadets and instructors, both past and present. I urge my colleagues to support this resolution.

FEDERAL BLACK LUNG PROGRAM

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, it would take me a great many pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to explain the extremely complex criteria, requirements, and adjudication process that have been promulgated under the Federal Black Lung Disability Program.

As it now stands, disabled miners who suffer from the crippling effects of black lung disease are being taxed beyond reason by a monolithic Federal bureaucracy so totally lacking in compassion to their plight that it appears intent upon harrassing their efforts to obtain just compensation at every single step of the claim adjudication process.

Today we are witnessing about a 4-percent approval rate on claims for black lung benefits. This figure does not attest to any reasonable and unbiased comportment of the facts. Rather, it represents nothing less than a cruel hoax being perpetrated against hard working citizens who have dedicated their lives to the energy security and economic well being of this Nation.

During a hearing on the program conducted by the Subcommittee on Labor Standards last year in Beckley, WV, one witness aptly described the current situation in this way:

Coal miners who were strong and vigorous workers have been reduced by years of inhaling coal dust to broken bodies, to strain for every breath. They are forced to go through degrading, humilating, and seemingly endless contests in a generally futile effort to obtain monthly benefits and medical care, a paltry compensation for the destruction of their health.

Mr. Speaker, this was to be a fairly straightforward program. It was certainly the intent of Congress that these coal miners and their dependents be compensated. Yet, through years of administrative maneuverings aggravated by some extremely harmful judicial interpretations, there can be no denial of the fact that black lung proceedings before the Labor Department today are extremely adversarial in nature against the claimant. This type of philosophy certainly does not represent the statutory commitment we made to compensate these coal miners.

I have mentioned congressional intent and made reference to harmful judicial decisions. The legislation I am submitting today seeks to address one of those cases, the 1987 Supreme Court decision in the Mullins case, by reinstituting the intent of Congress as it relates to the class of claims filed between July 1, 1973, and April 1, 1980, during what is known as the Labor Department's interim regulatory period.

These interim regulations were promulgated as a result of the Black Lung Benefits Reform Act of 1977 which in part required the Labor Department to adopt eligibility standards not less restrictive than what had been in effect on June 30, 1973; a reference to a set of standards promulgated in response to the Black Lung Benefits Act of 1972 by the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare which expired on that date.

It is widely believed that the interim Labor Department standards were far more restrictive than HEW's, the Court's decision in Mullins to the contrary. This belief is supported by the fact that the claim approval rate dramatically improved under the HEW standards while it continued to decline under the Labor Department's administration. Obviously, this difference in claim approval rates hardly supports the "no more restrictive" criteria established by the Congress in the 1977 act.

Interestingly enough, in a December 1988 Supreme Court decision relating to an aspect of the Labor Department's interim standards which was not within the scope of the Mullins case, the Court ruled that these standards were in fact in violation of the law. The class of claims involved in this decision involved the question of whether the interim standards were more restrictive as they related to claims filed by workers with less than 10 years of experience in the mines—a question which the Court decided in the affirmative—while the Mullins case primarily dealt with issues involving presumption of eligibility and rebuttal for claims filed by workers with at least 10 years experience during the interim program.

The bill I am introducing today, entitled the Black Lung Benefits Eligibility Clarification Act of 1989, seeks to address the Court's finding in the Mullins case—one which I strenuously disagree with—in support of the Labor Department's interim regulations. Joining in the introduction of this legislation are the gentlemen from Virginia, RICK BOUCHER, and from West Virginia, HARLEY STAGGERS, Jr. Our legislation would clearly impose the type of eligibility standard intended by the Congress in the 1977 act by reiterating that a claimant can establish a presumption of black lung with a single piece of qualifying evidence, just as was required under the HEW regulations in effect on June 30, 1973.

In the Mullins case, the claimant not only had a qualifying x ray, but two qualifying ventilatory studies and one qualifying physician's opinion and was nonetheless denied benefit eligibility.

This legislation by no means addresses all of the problems plaguing the Black Lung Program. There are so many of them, including the disenfranchisement of widow benefits and the pressing problem represented by the dearth of lawyers willing to take on black lung cases.

This bill is, however, intended to foster a new awareness within the Congress of the severity of the situation and to prompt some substantive remedial actions. During the Presidential campaign George Bush promised us a kinder and gentler Nation. Let us hope this promise extends to the Black Lung Benefits Program.

A TRIBUTE TO AFRICAN-AMERICAN ARCHITECTS

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, the history of the African-American architect in this Nation has been one which is characterized by tenacity of purpose and pursuit of opportunity and excellence. The achievements of these professionals in architectural practice, government, education, and allied endeavors have been stellar even in their very early days when formal education in architecture was not available in historically African-American institutions of higher education.

On February 9, 1911, the trustees of Howard University approved degree studies in architecture, thus creating what was to become a premier academy, the Howard University School of Architecture and Planning. The legacy of this school, its faculty, students, and alumni is repleat with distinctions that are well known and revered in the professional community and the community at large.

A measure of the greatness of an institution is the extent to which it acknowledges both those who contributed to its stature and those who labored parallel to it, but always to the same end. In this context, the Howard University School of Architecture, as a component of its Black History Month Celebration, will honor 13 African-American architects who have made significant contributions to the participation of African-Americans in the profession. Included among the awardees are the first African to attend and complete degree studies in South Africa and to practice independently in that country, early faculty members of Howard and Tuskegee Universities, the first African-American national officer of the American Institute of Architects, the past presidents of the National Architectural Accrediting Board and the National Council of Architectural Registration Boards, the only African-American architect to be elected mayor of a major American city and seven African-American Fellows of the AIA.

I share with you and our Nation profiles of the awardees:

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING THE LAKE ANDES-WAGNER AND MARTY II PROJECTS

HON. TIM JOHNSON

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, operate and maintain the Lake Andes-Wagner unit and the Marty II unit as elements of the Pick-Sloan Missouri Basin Program.

This project would greatly strengthen the agricultural base of the economy and stabilize the dangerous trend of population decrease in this region. The severe drought last summer highlighted the drastic need for irrigation development in this part of the country. Without this help, farmers and ranchers will continue to suffer, and the rural population will continue to dwindle. Unfortunately, predictions are already coming in that this area will be hit by drought once again. By surveying the past, we can see that drought is a constantly lingering fear, and we cannot afford to lose our family farmers and lose a way of life by standing by and doing nothing when we can take positive action now.

An answer has been found to mitigate this problem, and that is to irrigate. Through irrigation, farmers in the area will have a steady, reliable source of water. In addition to stabilizing the growth of traditional grain crops, irrigation would allow farmers in this area to diversify into specialty agricultural products such as potatoes. Greater diversification would strengthen the national agricultural economy as a whole. At the same time, this stabilization of feed grains would eliminate the farmer's need to purchase or import these grains for livestock in dry years, once again stabilizing the integrated family farm operation and potentially reducing foreign imports.

Both Lake Andes-Wagner and Marty II are located in Charles Mix County in southcentral South Dakota. These units are located near the Fort Randall Dam, one of the six Pick-Sloan dams on the mainstem of the Missouri itself. The reservoir formed by Fort Randall Dam, Lake Francis Case, would be the water supply source for the project.

Total irrigation from the Lake Andes-Wagner projects amounts to 45,000 acres, including about 1,700 acres of Indian-owned land located on the Yankton Sioux Reservation. All the lands included in the Lake Andes-Wagner unit are currently being dry farmed. The Marty II unit is made up of approximately 3,000 acres owned entirely by Indians and located on the Yankton Sioux Reservation; this portion of the project would be operated entirely by the Yankton Sioux Tribe. The economic problems on our Indian reservations in the United States today are well documented. These people are suffering and this irrigation project could be a tremendous boost to their economic base.

Authorization of this project is in accordance with the partial recognitiion of the Pick-Sloan commitments following the inundation of lands in South Dakota, including lands in the Yankton Sioux Indian Reservation, by mainstream Missouri River reservoirs constructed and operated by the United States. As the host State to four of the six mainstem dams built under the Pick-Sloan Program, South Dakota has contributed 530,000 acres of agricultural land, much of it prime farming bottom lands, to the mainstem Pick-Sloan dams and reservoirs. In total, 58,000 acres in Charles Mix are under the water stored by Fort Randall Dam and have been for more than three decades. The inundation of these lands has resulted in a significant amount of foregone economic activity, including lost farm land, lost wildlife habitat, lost personal income, and lost tax base. It has been estimated by economist Dr. Jay Leitch of North Dakota State University that the people of South Dakota lost $79 million per year as a result of foregone economic activity on the submerged lands.

In return for accepting this lost land and tax base, the Pick-Sloan legislation offered South Dakota an authorization for some 972,000 acres of irrigation to strengthen and stabilize the State's economy. Unfortunately, this promise has not been realized, since only 24,100 acres, or approximately 2 percent, have been developed under the program. In addition, while the bulk of the hydroelectricity is generated in South Dakota—67 percent of the entire Pick-Sloan system power—South Dakota receives only 17 percent of this hydropower. South Dakota exports 70 percent of the power it produces from the mainstem dams within the State. While South Dakota accounts for one-third of the entire project land, it is scheduled to receive only about $55 million in irrigation aid, yet Nebraska is scheduled to receive $800 million and North Dakota $526 million. Ratepayers in South Dakota subsidize irrigation and power for other States, yet they receive few of the benefits. It seems inequitable that South Dakota bore the bulk of the project while the majority of the benefits go to other States, so the project sponsors believe they have a clear case for their region to receive additional benefits from the Pick-sloan system in the form of irrigation development. The Lake Andes-Wagner and Marty II projects are reasonable, worthy, and economical projects to in part address the Federal Government's unmet commitment to the State of South Dakota.

The project sponsors have made a good faith effort to address each concern that has come before them; they have tried to compromise at every turn to develop a project which meets the fiscal criteria of the Government. A legitimate cost-share has been integrated into this legislation so that the costs of this project will be shared among Federal, State, and local entities. These people are more than willing to pay their fair share for the benefits which will accrue.

Project sponsors for the Lake Andes-Wagner and Marty II units have been tireless in their efforts to make this desire for a steady supply of water a reality. These people merely want to continue the tradition of the self-sufficient South Dakota family farmer. I believe that this project goes to the heart of the problem facing America's Westen States—the lack of water. People in this region have invested their hope in irrigation as a means to stabilize the agricultural economy. Furthermore, this project is another step toward meeting the Federal commitment emanating from the Pick-Sloan agreement. The project sponsors are willing to bear a heavy burden to make this project a reality, and they will continue working until they are successful. I stronly support their efforts, and I look forward to bringing economic stability to this region of South Dakota.

H.R. 823, THE TELEVISION SELF-REGULATION ACT OF 1988

HON. THOMAS J. TAUKE

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, as long as television has been a part of American life, Congress and the Federal Communications Commission have struggled to address problems with television programming and advertising. Concerns have been expressed about the effects of the depiction of violence on our children; the effects of too many commercials on programming; and the effects of children's shows that are program-length commercials, where the show itself becomes a sales vehicle, just to name a few.

These examples are only a part of the overall debate about what, and how, television stations should program for their audiences. Some say that the fairness doctrine, which was abolished by the FCC last year, was the last remaining regulation which assures that TV stations operate for the benefit of their viewing public. I disagree with that contention, as the House knows. However, I believe strongly that effective steps should be taken to make the television industry more responsible for the shows they beam to the Nation, and more attentive to the possible effects of its products on our citizens.

There are basically two ways to accomplish the goal of better, more responsible television programming. In the first way, the Government imposes restrictions on what stations may program or advertise, or for how long they may do it, almost as a reflexive response to some perceived wrong. Legislation of this kind may seem smooth and inmocuous on the surface. But the deeper you go, the murkier the rights of broadcasts become.

This Congress has approved two bills that provide excellent illustrations of the pitfalls of this approach. Last year, in the Fairness in Broadcasting Act, H.R. 1934/S. 742, we would have required all television and radio stations to provide time for the discussions of opposing views on issues of public importance. This sounds fair on the surface. But in reality, this legislation would have empowered the visible hand of Government to reach into the editor's office and dictate the content of newscasts. Not only that, but if the Government is not satisfied with the balance given to a story, it could impose sanctions against the station. Needless to say, this is a result precisely at odds with the letter and spirit of the first amendment. Fortunately, the President recognized this when he vetoed the bill, and the FCC demonstrated the violence it would have done to the first amendment when it repealed its fairness doctrine regulation last year.

My second example is provided by the Children's Television Act (H.R. 3966), which this House passed just last June and which the President pocket vetoed. The bill's major provision limits the amount of commercial time that may be aired during children's programs on the theory that too many commercials harm children in some way. Yet, no clear evidence was presented to indicate how many commercials are too many, or how children are hurt by too many commercials. Not only that, but the vast majority of TV stations are not even violating the time limits ultimately imposed by the bill. Finally, no attempt was made to gauge the effects of this allegedly harmful advertising on children watching programs other than children's programs, even though children watch more TV during prime time than on Saturday mornings.

The worst thing about the Children's Television Act is that many appear to believe the bill will foster improvements in children's programming. However, they are sadly mistaken. The bill never addressed in any substantive way the root concerns of parents and children's TV advocates—improving the programming our children watch.

The same thing can be said of fairness doctrine legislation. It does not improve programming. It provides no incentives for TV stations or networks to address problems associated with what news they cover or how they cover it. Legislation of this kind only provides hoops through which broadcasters jump in exchange for tacit Government agreement to let them run their business undisturbed. I say that kind of trade does no one any good. In fact, it perpetuates the very problems that legislation is meant to solve.

These attempts at reregulation come at a time in which broadcast television is losing significant audiences to cable TV and other video entertainment. Twenty percent of the broadcast network audience has been lost in the last 4 years. Clearly, in order to stay competitive, broadcasters need less regulation, not more. Not even must-carry legislation or the advent of high-definition television will save their preeminent place in the video world if their programming is not distinctive and desirable. After all, people watch programs, not pictures.

In the new, competitive video world, broadcasters cannot rely on jumping through regulatory hoops to retain the value of their licenses. Those hoops prevent them from responding effectively to the new challenges posed by an environment where consumers have many more places to go to get their news and entertainment. Legislation that imposes Government controls over content contributes to the stagnation of broadcast TV network programming, and ultimately to the decline of broadcast TV as a major force in American news and entertainment.

Both broadcasters and the Government face a dilemma. How can better programming be encouraged without censorship? I believe there is an alternative to the heavy hand of Government that does not add more hoops for broadcasters to jump through.

Those who are truly concerned about preserving our over-the-air system of broadcasting should encourage the television industry to better its service to the public in ways that the Government cannot, and should not, mandate. The best way to accomplish that goal is by permitting broadcasters to enact a comprehensive code governing the programming and practices of the television industry. The National Association of Broadcasters once had a code, but abandoned it after a 1982 court decision suspended it in part. Thus, legislation is necessary for broadcasters to set industrywide standards.

Today, I am introducing the Television Self-Regulation Act. Through its provisions, the television industry could work together to improve its programming in substantive, meaningful ways. A new broadcasting code would avoid the problems inherent in Government oversight of the content of broadcast programming. Through a new code, broadcasters could effectively address many of the problems that have vexed lawmakers and regulators for decades: The appropriate amount of advertising during programs, including children's programs; the curbing of portrayals of violence; even the responsibility of news and public affairs programs to present more than one side of important issues. The code would be voluntary in nature. However, the FCC could take a station's compliance with the code into account at renewal time. Participating stations thus could gain an advantage in the license renewal process by complying with the code's provisions.

Restoring the industry's ability to adopt cooperative programming standards would encourage the television industry to make collective decisions regarding programming and advertising standards that affect the industry as a whole. This is particularly appropriate in light of the place television occupies in our national life. Broadcasting provides a lifeline of shared experiences that knits our Nation together. It also is an important source of values and morals. We must never forget that. It should make us even warier of direct Government controls over programming content.

In an age where broadcasting shapes the national consciousness and frames the national debate, we must be concerned not only about the quantity of available programming, but about its quality as well. The other body has recognized this: Last year, it unanimously passed a bill, S. 844, to permit broadcasters to establish standards to lessen the amount of violent programming. It is time the House took a similar path, and allowed those who produce and air the programming to cooperate with each other to improve the programming.

Some say that television cannot be special unless it is subject to Government regulation. However, the focus should be less on who regulates and more on what the result is. Content controls imposed by the Federal Government will have consequences that are disturbing for the future of the broadcasting industry as we know it. I urge all Members who want to encourage the television industry toward more innovative, responsible programming, and advertising to support the Television Self-Regulation Act.

ELBERT P. TUTTLE COURT OF APPEALS BUILDING

HON. JOHN LEWIS

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to designate the U.S. Court of Appeals Building at 56 Forsyth Street in Atlanta, GA, as the "Elbert P. Tuttle Court of Appeals Building." I could not think of a more fitting tribute for this 92-year-old American hero.

There are few judges who have had the impact on the law that Judge Tuttle has had and continues to have. As Chief Judge of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit from 1960 to 1967, the height of the civil rights movement, he led the court and wrote opinions that fundamentally changed the legal landscape of the South. Jim Crow laws were declared unconstitutional; voting rights for African Americans became a reality; racial discrimination in jury selection was curbed; State universities and colleges were desegregated; and education at all levels, perhaps one of the most important opportunities for all children, was given paramount importance.

Judge's Tuttle's leadership and the legal imagination and courage shown by him and other members of that great court made change possible not only in the South, but in the Nation as a whole. Moreover, the sound legal basis of the results reached by the fifth circuit added legitimacy to the rulings of the Supreme Court, by placing the Court in the position of affirming the opinions of the South's own judges, rather than imposing its will from on high in Washington, DC.

Through the judge's career, both on and off the bench, he has consistently stood for a humane approach to law, one that focuses on the parties involved and the particular human issues they represent. For Judge Tuttle, the law is not only a chess game but, the complex embodiment of human attempts to resolve human problems. It is his focus on the human dimensions of a case that explains why in some instances, be believes the law must change. It is also his focus on the human dimensions of a case that explains why cases do not linger in Judge Tuttle's office. The dispatch and care with which he renders his clear, logical opinions are increased by his sensitivity to the real parties in the case before him and their desire to have the case resolved.

His sensitivity and logic were strong characteristics of his formal opinions for the court. He is a fine writer, reflective of his days as a newsman at the Times. His opinions were smooth, logical, and natural instructure.

It has often been said that Judge Tuttle is incapable of being unfair. He has a single standard. It applies to him as well as everyone else. He is no less exacting of others than he is of himself. Never has he allowed the person of a party, the reputation or action of counsel sway him from a cold analysis of competing factors leading to a conviction.

As a result of his rendering many decisions on behalf of proponents of the Civil Rights movement, Judge Tuttle was socially ostracized by southern whites as well as many in the Republican Party. I am thankful that this Nation was blessed with such a jurist of conscience, the likes of which we may never see again.

Again I offer this tribute to one of our Nation's heros and urge your support of this resolution.

RETIREMENT OF JOE CUCCHIARA—OUTSTANDING CITIZEN

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding leader and tireless public servant from California's 16th Congressional District, Santa Cruz County Supervisor Joe Cucchiara. On February 9, a retirement dinner will be held to honor Joe Cucchiara in Santa Cruz. While I cannot be at the retirement dinner, I am pleased to have this opportunity to express my sincere appreciation to Joe for his endless hours of hard work and also to share with my colleagues a glimpse of the many contributions Joe has made to Santa Cruz and the Nation as a whole.

Joe Cucchiara was born here in Washington, DC in 1947. He graduated from the University of Maryland and then went on to perform graduate work in areas of interior design and architecture at the Pratt Institute in New York, the National Art Academy in Washington, DC, and the University of California at Berkeley.

Joe started his career as a member of the innovative human behavior and architectural design team for the NASA Skylab Earth Station in 1969. He continued working in the architectural field during the early seventies on industrialized building systems design projects in New York and Zurich while also teaching architectural design at the University of California at Berkeley.

In 1974 Joe started his long tradition of putting his architectural skills to work for the community that characterized his career of public service. From 1974 until 1980, Joe was a principal architect in an energy and design firm that emphasized self-help housing to provide low-cost housing for the needy.

Joe was elected to the Santa Cruz County Board of Supervisors for 1980 through 1988 and also served as chairman of the board of supervisors in 1983 and 1988.

Mr. Speaker, rarely have I encountered a public servant who is willing to give so selflessly of himself as Joe Cucchiara is. Since his election to the Santa Cruz County Board of Supervisors, Joe has been involved in countless projects to assist the residents of Santa Cruz County, from energy conservation to drug abuse rehabilitation. But it is specifically in the areas of disaster assistance and environmental protection that Joe's assistance has been virtually indispensable to me.

Without Joe's efforts in obtaining disaster assistance funds for Santa Cruz in the early 1980's, Santa Cruz County may very well have never recovered from the destruction caused by the catastrophic floods and landslides in 1982, 1983, and 1986.

Joe was the first to initiate and implement the innovative concept of using private investment funds to repair publicly owned roads and drainage facilities which were damaged in the Santa Cruz County flood disasters of a few years ago. Through his efforts, Santa Cruz County was able to obtain $5 million in private investment funds and lobby for an additional $3 million in disaster assistance from the State and Federal Governments.

Joe was also instrumental in working with the National Association of Counties to launch a review here in Congress of the Federal Disaster Relief Act of 1974 which eventually led to the major disaster relief reform bill that was passed by the House last fall.

I am also indebted to Joe for lobbying before Congress and the Governor of the State of California in favor of protecting the coast of California from the proposed Outer Continental Shelf gas and oil exploration and development in California.

I am sure that my colleagues will agree on how much we as Members of Congress depend on the support of our local community leaders to get the job done. I have been extremely lucky to have had the honor and pleasure to work with a man as dedicated and committed to serving the residents of Santa Cruz County as Joe Cucchiara.

Sylvia and I would like to join the people of Santa Cruz County in congratulating Joe on his retirement. You can be sure that he will be missed by all who have had the pleasure of working with him. I am sure that my colleagues will want to join me in wishing Joe the best of luck in the years to come.

A TRIBUTE TO SUSAN KELLY KENNEDY

HON. NANCY PELOSI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great honor that I take this opportunity to recognize Susan Kelly Kennedy on the occasion of her retirement from public service

As she begins a new chapter in her life, it is appropriate that we remember her dedication and distinguished service to the people of San Francisco and to the Nation.

Susan Kelly Kennedy graduated from St. Paul's High School in San Francisco. She was employed by George Hardy at the Service Employees Union after graduation. In 1960, she was elected as the youngest member of the San Francisco Democratic County Central Committee and she served on that local governing body of the party for a quarter-century.

In April 1962 she was hired by Assemblyman Phillip Burton, chairman of the committee on social welfare, as a member of the committee staff. When Mr. Burton was elected to Congress in February 1964, Mrs. Kennedy joined his staff and was responsible for opening a full-time district office to provide service for San Francisco constituents. This was a significant accomplishment. It was the first time a Congressman had opened a full-time district office in California, and it added a new dimension to the public service responsibilities of Representatives which today is accepted as commonplace.

Mrs. Kennedy has long been active in Irish-American affairs in San Francisco and was a member of an official San Francisco delegation to Ireland. Her lifetime devotion to the cause of organized labor in San Francisco is exemplary.

Following the death of Congressman Phillip Burton, Mrs. Kennedy served as a principal staff member in the San Francisco office of his widow, and successor Congresswoman Sala Burton until her death in early 1987. Then, during the summer of 1987, Mrs. Kennedy assisted me during the transition when I was elected to serve the Fifth District of California.

Having long shared the Burton family enthusiasm for the environmental movement and for the National Park Service's endeavors at the Golden Gate National Recreation Area, Mrs. Kennedy accepted an administrative position at the recreation area to assist in the creation of a separate unit for maritime history and to coordinate the completion of the memorial to Congressman Phillip Burton which had been authorized by Congress. After a career in public service spanning more than a quarter-century, Mrs. Kennedy has decided to retire. We of San Francisco are grateful for her hard work and dedication, which have been a good example of how staff members may enable Members of Congress to more effectively serve their constituents and the Nation more effectively.

CONGRESSIONAL PAY RAISE

HON. ARLAN STANGELAND

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. STANGELAND. Mr. Speaker, I register my opposition to the Commission on Executive, Legislative and Judicial Salaries' recommendation for a 50 percent salary increase for Federal judges, Cabinet Secretaries, top level executive branch officials and Members of Congress. I object to the pay raise, and I also believe the process by which it is secured is in need of reform. That is why I have joined as a cosponsor of H.R. 401—the Congressional Pay Reform Act. This much needed legislation will mandate a recorded vote by every Member of Congress, and will defer the salary raise until the succeeding Congress.

Although this is a correct measure whose time has come, its chances of passage before February 7 are, as they say, slim and none. The House of Representatives must not hide behind the shroud of sneaky parliamentary procedures rather than vote on the 50 percent pay raise. Thus, Mr. Speaker, it is up to you and the Democratic majority.

It is my firm hope that the 101st Congress will be allowed to vote on the pay raise proposal which I will oppose. We owe ourselves, the great institution we serve and the American people, who have entrusted us to be their honest champions, nothing less.

VIETNAM VETERANS POSTTRAUMATIC STRESS DISORDER COMPENSATION ACT

HON. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Vietnam Veterans Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Compensation Act which would provide a presumption of service connection for the occurrence of posttraumatic stress disorders [PTSD] in veterans who served in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era.

Approximately 4 million Americans were stationed in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam war. For many of those who returned, the war still is never very far away. It has a profound impact on their lives and that of their families and friends. It continues to haunt them, often resulting in the most disturbing consequences.

According to the Readjustment Counseling Service for the Veterans' Administration, about 20 percent of Vietnam have substantial war-related psychological difficulties that are impairing their lives. A recently completed 5-year American Legion-Columbia University Vietnam Veterans Study concluded that 15 percent of the Legionnaires who had experienced high combat in Vietnam fulfilled the medical criteria for PTSD. This study also showed that this problem does not diminish with time. Although some of the veterans suffered their trauma as much as 20 years ago, the same level of PTSD symptoms persist. Another study, the National Vietnam Veterans Readjustment Study, by the Research Triangle Institute, estimated that about 15 percent, plus or minus 2.6 percent of male veterans who served in Vietnam are currently suffering from PTSD. Among female Vietnam theater veterans, 9 percent, plus or minus 2.8 percent, are current cases of PTSD. Current prevalence rates among blacks are 19 percent, plus or minus 4.5 percent. For Hispanics, the rate is over 20 percent, plus or minus 7 percent. This means that 600,000 to 800,000 veterans plus family members are still suffering the effects of the tragic period in our history.

In 1980, the American Psychiatric Association published the "Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders," third edition, with a new category: Posttraumatic stress disorder, acute, chronic and/or delayed. The symptoms of posttraumatic stress disorder listed in SMD-III include nightmares and flashbacks—ranging from minor to overwhelming—of traumatic events, insomnia; anxiety; depression; irrationality; numbling alienation from friends, family and society; inability to resume productive living; impulsive behavior, and survivor guilt. Additionally, some Vietnam veterans demonstrate complex educational, social, economic and life-style problems.

The VA Readjustment Counseling Service has chronicled several categories of stresses that are found in Vietnam veterans—stresses that are unique to the Vietnam war.

Veterans suffer, admittedly, from the psychiatric trauma inherent in all wars. These include prolonged threat of annihilation; exposure to multiple deaths, dismemberment, mutilation, agony, and bodily destruction of both friends and enemies; horrid living conditions; and the cultivation of a state of mind permitting one to attack and kill others over an extended period of time.

Additionally, there are the stresses caused by the particular military and political features of the Vietnam war.

Exposure to terrorism, affecting both combatants and noncombatants over an extended period of time, was a unique feature of the Vietnam war.

There also was a sense of purposelessness about the involvement in the Vietnam war which was absent in other wars. No matter how one viewed Vietnam, most soldiers in Vietnam experienced it as meaningless, absurd, and wasteful.

It was not enough that the Vietnam war experience itself was an extreme emotional assault on the combat soldier, the stress of homecoming proved almost as difficult. Unlike the end of World War II, when veterans came home with friends on troopships and were able to spend time making a gradual transition from combat to peacetime and were greeted by cheering crowds, parades, and a thankful public, Vietnam veterans came back by plane, in less than 48 hours, with no debriefing, and frequently were greeted with hostility, embarrassment, or indifference. Nobody wanted to hear about Vietnam.

Also unique to the Vietnam experience has been the postwar period since 1975. The war itself dragged on to a chaotic conclusion, ending in total defeat for the United States-supported Saigon government. And, since then, the United States has pursued a policy of generally avoiding the present-day nation of Vietnam.

Adding to the war experience and the trauma of the return home, is the fact that most veterans have found it difficult to obtain treatment for their psychological disorders. Until the beginning of the Vietnam veterans outreach project by the Disabled American Veterans in the fall of 1978, and the startup of Operation Outreach by the VA in October 1979, most Vietnam veterans were unable to receive counseling or psychotherapy for war-related symptoms.

All of these factors, taken in whole or in part, contribute to the presence of PTSD in as many as 800,000 Vietnam veterans. For many of these veterans, what was once a reaction to a traumatic situation or episode may become an almost unchangeable personality characteristic and can be extremely debilitating.

In February 1987, the Center for Disease Control released its Vietnam Experience Study, summarized in the February 13, 1987, issue of the Journal of the American Medical Association. The CDC study, commissioned by Congress in two separate actions in 1979 and 1981, was designed to assess the health of Vietnam veterans.

The Journal of the American Medical Association summarized the CDC's study as follows:

> The postservice morality—through December 1983—of a cohort of 9,324 U.S. Army veterans who served in Vietnam was compared with that of 8,989 Vietnam-era Army veterans who served in Korea, Germany, or the United States. Over the entire followup period, total mortality in Vietnam veterans was 17 percent higher than for other veterans.

Most of the excess deaths occurred in the first 5 years after discharge, according to the JAMA article, and were primarily related to external causes rather than diseases or medical conditions. In contrast to other veterans, Vietnam vets exhibited 72 percent more suicides, 93 percent more auto fatalities, and 69 percent more accidental poisonings, mostly in the form of drug overdoses.

The CDC states, in drawing conclusions from the statistical evidence:

> Our findings and previous studies suggest that the post-service excess in traumatic deaths among Vietnam veterans is probably due to unusual stresses endured while stationed in a hostile fire zone.

In citing the uniqueness of the Vietnam experience, the report notes:

> * * * our findings may reflect consequences of the unique environment and experiences of serving in Vietnam and returning to an unsupportive and sometimes hostile climate in the United States.

Findings similar to those of the CDC were contained in the final report of the Wisconsin Vietnam Veterans Mortality Study issues in March 1986. The study consisted of a cohort analysis of 43,398 veterans who served in Vietnam. Their mortality risk was compared to the experience of 78,840 veterans in the Vietnam war period who did not serve in Vietnam. The findings showed that the Vietnam veteran experienced a higher mortality rate for all external causes of death, all accidents, and all motor vehicle accidents when compared to non-Vietnam veterans. When compared to civilians, the Vietnam veterans had a higher risk for suicide.

In forwarding a copy of the study to me, the Secretary of the Wisconsin Department of Veterans Affairs, John J. Maurer, noted:

> The pattern of higher mortality in the accident, suicide, and cirrhosis deaths show that the Vietnam veterans' concerns for posttraumatic stress disorder are real and substantial. These increases are indicative of a high underlying level of stress which may have been caused by the veterans' war time experience in Vietnam.

Beginning in October 1980, the Veterans' Administration accepted the diagnosis of posttraumatic stress disorder, delayed type, as a potentially compensable disorder. This meant that for the first time since World War I, the VA could consider disorders to be service-connected when the symptoms first appeared more than 1 or 2 years after military discharge. However, there is still considerable uncertainty regarding the VA's effectiveness in meeting readjustment needs of those veterans who suffer from PTSD. To correct this situation, the Vietnam Veterans Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Compensation Act, which I am introducing today, permits the VA to accept a presumption of service-connection when posttraumatic stress disorders are found in veterans who served in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam era, using the definition of PTSD contained in DMS–III. Section 313 of title 38, establishing the presumptions rebuttable, is retained. Joining me as original cosponsors of the Vietnam Veterans Posttraumatic Stress Disorder Compensation Act are: Mr. TOWNS, Mr. FOGLIETTA, Mr. MOODY, Mr. LEWIS of Georgia, Mr. STOKES, Mr. OBEY, Mr. DYMALLY, Mr. MARTINEZ, Mr. WOLPE, Mr. MCHUGH, Mrs. COLLINS, Mr. DELUGO, Mr. GUNDERSON, Mr. WEISS, Mr. VENTO, Mr. FEIGHAN, Mr. OWENS of New York, Mr. FRANK, Mr. BONIOR, Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut, Ms. KAPTUR, Mr. TORRES, Mr. DEFAZIO, Mr. KLECZKA, Mr. RANGEL, Mrs. KENNELLY, Mr. CROCKETT, Mr. ACKERMAN, Mr. FAZIO, Mr. STUDDS, Mrs. BOXER, Mr. ESPY, Mr. BUSTAMANTE, Mr. GILMAN, and Mr. EVANS.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is the PTSD has been identified and its presence in literally thousands of Vietnam veterans has been acknowledged by authorities in the fields of both psychological disorders and veterans' disabilities. The symptoms have been delineated by the American Psychiatric Association, providing a body of criteria to be met to establish the presence of the disorder. It seems appropriate, in light of all this, to enact legislation to provide the presumption of service-connection in the case of the presence of PTSD in Vietnam veterans.

REINTRODUCTION OF THE FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, now, more than ever, the families of America need the protection of a family leave minimum labor standard.

The work force is changing dramatically and these changes have had a profound impact on the American family. The two-worker family is increasingly becoming the norm. The primary provision of the Family and Medical Leave Act—job security—simply guarantees that employees who must take leave are not fired. This is the job security issue of our day.

And the fact of the matter is that yesterday's family, a working father with a wife who stays home with the children, is no longer the norm.

By and large, in today's family both parents work. Women are entering and reentering the work force with greater frequency than ever before. Today, over 50 million women work outside the home, comprising over 44 percent of our national work force. The vast majority of all mothers hold down jobs outside the home, and increasingly, they are mothers of young children. Fully two-thirds of these working women are single parents. The other third of working women are married to men who earn less than $15,000 per year.

Why are women working in such great numbers today? Clearly, some are professional women on career paths. But the data is clear: the greatest single motivating factor is economic pressure. Simply put, it now takes two wage earners to sustain the same standard of living that one income could provide just 15 years ago. These families are not getting rich. They are getting by.

The cost of the American dream has gone up.

In addition, the elderly population is the fastest growing segment of our society. Medical cost controls that are sending our frail elderly home from hospitals sicker and quicker are increasing the need for home health care. The need for home hospice care is also growing. Studies indicate that it is women, and in this day and age, women with jobs, who are most likely to provide such home care.

The workplace must adjust to the needs of dual-earner families where both spouses work out of economic necessity. What can be more important to the economic protection of the family than job security?

The time has come to develop a family and medical leave policy that would guarantee that employees who must take leaves of absence because of child birth, a serious illness, or serious illness among family members will not be fired and will have their jobs remain open.

It is the job security issue of our day.

I realize that some business organizations have expressed their philosophical opposition to any family and medical leave legislation claiming that it represents mandated benefits. It does not. It is a minimum standard of protection consistent with the social and economic realities of contemporary society. It is fully consonant, traditional labor laws establishing minimum standards for child labor laws, those against sweat shops, worker health and safety laws, restrictions on overtime, and the minimum wage.

I share the concerns of business, especially small business, that far-reaching family leave legislation could harm productivity and profitability. That's why I have worked so hard to develop a compromise that balances the needs of employees to take leaves and the needs of employers to maintain productivity.

Under its terms, employees would be allowed up to 10 weeks unpaid leave for birth or adoption of a child or to care for a seriously ill child or parent, and up to 15 weeks unpaid leave for their own serious illness. Initially, only employers with at least 50 employees would be covered. After 2 years, a commission would report to Congress about the effect of this legislation on small business. One year later, the benchmark for the number of employees would drop to 35, unless Congress took other action based on the commission report. In order to qualify for leave, employees must have worked for their employer for more than 1 year and for at least 20 hours per week. Finally, the compromise contains a "business necessity" exemption for key personnel.

The compromise embodied in the Family and Medical Leave Act of 1989 strikes the proper balance between the needs of employees to take leave to care for family members and the needs of employers to continue efficient operation.

Mr. Speaker, to more fully explain the need for family and medical leave legislation, I have asked to be reprinted here an article I wrote on the bill that appeared in the August 22, 1988, edition of U.S. News & World Report:

THE GOP's MYOPIC VISION OF THE FAMILY

MARGE ROUKEMA ON HER PARTY'S NEED TO LOOK HOMEWARD

With the Republican convention at hand and the presidential campaign in high gear, candidates are rediscovering "the family." High time, too, particularly for my Republican Party, which considers itself the party of family values.

Both parties are engaged in an expensive bidding war over child care, the fashionable issue of this election season. The day-care center has replaced the factory plant gate as the campaign photo opportunity of choice.

Child care is an important national concern, of course. But we seem to have gone to extremes in focusing solely on it and committing billions to something that is more properly the province of businesses and the states.

The family issue that my party should be addressing is the need for a family-and-medical-leave policy—one that protects workers' jobs if they need a short, unpaid leave to deal with their own serious illnesses, to have a baby or to care for a sick family member.

I speak as both a Republican and as a woman who at one time chose to leave my profession as a teacher to become a full-time mother. I was fortunate to have a choice. While some women work because they want to, many work out of economic necessity. The price of the American dream has increased. Two thirds of women hold jobs outside the home because they are divorced, widowed, single or have husbands who earn less than $15,000 a year. Today's working families are not getting rich; they are getting by.

This is a reality of family life that has changed, while the Grand Old Party has not. It's time for the GOP to face the facts of life as they are. Along with Representative Bill Clay, a Missouri Democrat, I have introduced legislation that would require companies with 50 or more employees to allow workers who have been on the job for at least one year 10 weeks of unpaid leave for a birth or family illness and no more than 15 weeks for their own illness. This measure, which the General Accounting Office estimates would cost businesses just $188 million annually, is a carefully balanced compromise that takes into account the legitimate desires of small businesses to maintain their productivity. It is so well-balanced, in fact, that I have been bludgeoned from both the left and the right. Yet many of my Republican colleagues are reluctant to support it.

There is another part of the new family equation: Those over age 75. Although Americans are healthier and living longer, an overwhelming majority of these elderly will need the care of a family member when serious illness strikes. This is not an abstract problem. Families are thrown into crisis in these situations. I know. When my son was stricken with leukemia and needed care, I was free to remain at home. But what of the millions of mothers who work for the thousands of companies that do not have family-leave policies? According to a Wall Street Journal survey, only about 15 percent of companies have such policies. Imagine the utter anguish a mother—or for that matter a father—faces when they know a seriously ill child or elderly parent needs them—and know, too, that absence from work may mean loss of their job.

A family-leave policy is consistent with established labor standards that gave us such protections as the 40-hour workweek. As society has changed, we have adjusted labor-protection standards accordingly. And this is not the kind of federal mandate that would interfere with collective bargaining or sorely strain our global competitiveness.

There is huge grass-roots support for a leave policy. I feel it in the reaction when I raise the subject back home and around the United States. Some time ago, I addressed tried-and-true party loyalists in my home county. To my surprise, my remarks generated, not controversy, but a standing ovation.

A family-leave policy is not just another "photo op" at a child-care center. It is a bedrock family issue that we in the GOP ignore at our peril.

PROTECTING THE DESERT

HON. ALFRED A. (AL) McCANDLESS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, the other day I was visiting the office of a Texas colleague and on the wall I saw a sign. It read, "Never ask a man where he's from. If he's from Texas, he'll tell you. And if he's not, why embarrass the poor fellow." I liked that sign because it showed the pride of Lone Star natives. And while I'm not from Texas, I have a home of which I am equally proud. That home is the California Desert.

For those of you who have never been there, let me explain a little about my part of the country. The California Desert is not sun-baked wasteland or endless sand dunes that you see in Hollywood movies. It's a vibrant, life-filled place, blessed with the bounty of nature. The desert is a place of mountains and valleys, wildlife, native flowers and clear nights. The desert is a place of stark, arid beauty, a special place, and I'm wholly committed to protecting it.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the enactment of California Desert wilderness legislation, but I believe its contents just as important as its passage. That is why I object to the bill introduced today by my colleague from Los Angeles [Mr. LEVINE]. The California Desert, with all its wonders, must be protected for the people, not from them.

The Cranston-Levine bill proposes to restrict access to 7.4 million acres of public desert lands. In everyday terms that means the bill would take an area the size of Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island combined, create three new national parks within them, and reserve the rest for the sole use of naturalists. On 4.4 million acres, or more than one-third of all public lands, access would be limited to hikers, backpackers and equestrians alone. Under this bill, less than four-tenths of the desert's resources would remain open to multiple use.

I object to the excessiveness of this proposal, and judging from the thousands of letters I've received, so do my constituents. Together, we believe the bounty of the desert can provide for all. There is room among its 12.1 million public acres for parks and wilderness, as well as hunting and grazing, rockhounding, mining, and off-highway recreation. We can protect the sensitive, without wholesale surrender of the desert's vast mineral resources. We can maintain wilderness without elimination of livestock. We can preserve solitude while allowing motorized family recreation. We can do it equitably. However, the bill introduced today does not.

I invite the sponsors of this legislation to work with those most affected, the people of the desert, to create a more balanced alternative. I urge them to attend our town meetings and listen to the voices of those who love the desert, support preserving it, and also promote its continued responsible use.

MINNESOTA POLAR EXPLORER TO CHALLENGE ANTARCTICA

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, 2 years and 9 months ago, on May 1, 1986, an expedition of six brave adventurers, led by two men from my district, Will Steger and Paul Schurke of Ely, MN, reached the North Pole. After nearly 2 months on the polar ice, and using only dogs and human muscle to move equipment and supplies, the Steger International Polar Expedition became the first verified successful mission to the Pole without the aid of motorized transportation or resupply.

It was not long after the conclusion of this adventure that Steger began to plan his next Polar trek, this time to the South Pole. Six months from now, on August 1, 1989, Steger plans to lead an international team on a 7-month journey—again by dogsled—across the Antarctic Continent.

The story of Steger's plans and his preparations for the expedition is told in the accompanying article, which appeared in this week in the Washington Post. I respectfully submit it to my colleagues as a tribute to these courageous explorers and yet another example of the indomitable spirit of mankind:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 31, 1989]

NORTH POLE CONQUEROR HEADS SOUTH

NEW YORK.—This is a watershed week for Will Steger, when he stops being a pitchman and resumes life as an adventurer.

For 2½ years, Steger has been drumming up funds for his ambitious plan to trek 4,000 miles across Antarctica by dog sled. Now, with $7 million in the bank, another $1 million in the pipeline and an Aug. 1 departure date looming, it's time to head for the hinterlands to train.

So how do you prepare for seven months in the harshest land on Earth? For starters, Steger and five colleagues from around the world will spend half of next month transporting portable toilets into the Minnesota backwoods by dog sled.

"Actually, it's ideal," said the slender, 43-year-old Steger, here last week for a final round of interviews. "The state needed to get 700 latrines into primitive campsites in the Boundary Waters Canoe Area and we needed a purpose for our training sessions." So a marriage of convenience was born, marking the humble beginning of a grand plan.

Steger led a remarkable voyage to the North Pole three years ago, when he and five others made the first successful unresupplied trek there via dog sled. His book about the trip, "North to the Pole," is an adventuring classic full of horrifying hardship.

Along the way, by bizarre coincidence, he met a Frenchman, Jean-Louis Etienne, who was skiing alone to the Pole with the aid of a resupply plane. Huddled together in a tent on a bitter, 50 degrees-below-zero night, Etienne and Steger discovered a common ambition to cross Antarctica and got so caught up in the talk, they kept gabbing even after the stove ran out of fuel.

That's commitment.

Yet when they headed off on different paths the next morning, Steger said he wasn't looking too far ahead. "What Jean-Louis was doing was pretty risky."

But both missions succeeded and when they returned to civilization, the men got in touch. They agreed on a multinational expedition to highlight the precarious circumstances of Antarctica, where one-tenth of the Earth's land is protected from commercial and military exploitation by a fragile, worldwide peace pact that expires in 1991.

The plan got a big boost when two major financial sponsors came on board, Steger bagging Gore-Tex and Etienne the French insurance company UAP. The Soviet Union offered a man, Victor Boyarsky, and full backup support including a Soviet plane to fly gear and 50,000 pounds of food to the starting point next summer.

Adventurers from Japan, China and England filled out the six-man team. A woman was part of Steger's North Pole team, the first of her gender to trek to that end of the Earth, but he said the only woman he could find who was qualified for the South Pole trip had other plans.

The average age of his fellow Antarctic explorers is over 40, a fact that bothers Steger not a whit. "A trip like this is about 25 percent physical and 75 percent psychological," he said. "You take a young person; he might be fit. But put him on rations in severe cold in close quarters and he might not make it.

"We're all established people. We're not self-centered; we're not trying to find ourselves. We'll be looking out for each other, not trying to prove anything."

Anyway, he's already confident five of the crew can work together well. All but the Chinese member, Guo Xiaogang, who hadn't been selected yet, spent two months mushing 1,800 miles across Greenland, south to north, last summer, including a 1,450-mile unresupplied stretch. The biggest problem? "Boredom," said Steger. "It was no North Pole."

The Antarctic trip, by contrast, will be a North Pole and more. Steger's last adventure was but a 1,000-mile, two-month affair. Now he's looking at more than half a year in the elements, at 16 times the expense.

The group's assets already include a $3 million, 120-foot aluminum ship to serve as a communications base and three airplanes on charter to fly in supplies and make a rescue if needed. Gasoline is being flown into the South Pole at $225 a gallon to assure access to a stretch east of the Pole called "The Area of Inaccessibility," where no one has ever gone on foot or landed a plane.

The men will work in pairs, each duo handling a sled and a dozen dogs. "It will be the first traverse ever on foot," said Steger, "and we're taking the longest possible route."

Challenges include altitude, Antarctica being the highest continent on Earth; ultraviolet rays, a result of the depleted ozone layer there; cold and wind, with temperatures dipping to 40 below and winds ranging to 30 knots and higher. Crevasses are a constant peril in this glacial land, and there is no remoter place on Earth. "We won't see anyone or anything except our resupply team for 2,000 miles," Steger said.

The last major successful assault on Antarctica was led by a Britisher, Robert Swan, who with two partners man-hauled sleds to the very bottom of the globe in 1984. Swan, oddly enough, is now organizing a man-hauling attempt on the North Pole starting March 1, while Steger readies his voyage south.

But as oddly parallel as the lives of these two adventurers are running, Steger says they have little in common.

"Swan says he doesn't like the cold," said Steger. "He's going for some other reason, for social causes.

"I like cold, remote places. I like to say I'm not driven to the Arctic, I'm drawn to it."

LONG-TERM CARE INSURANCE FOR FEDERAL WORKERS

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to join with Representative FRENCH SLAUGHTER in reintroducing the Federal Employees Long-Term Care Protection Act. The need for long-term care will reach crisis proportions soon, yet most Americans are largely unaware of the impending threat to their financial security. We have promised to address this issue, and this bill is a first step.

Federal workers are generally well insured under the array of Government sponsored group life and health insurance policies. However, like most other Americans, Federal employees have no protection against the catastrophic costs associated with long-term care for chronic and debilitating illness. This bill would allow the Office of Personnel Management [OPM] to negotiate optional long-term care protection for Federal workers using the Federal group life insurance [FEGLI] plan as a vehicle. It grants OPM authority to contract through a competitive selection process for group life insurance products which can, at the employee's option, be "rolled over" to long-term care insurance while still preserving a minimum death benefit. Under this proposal, all long-term care insurance plans offered to Federal workers must meet or exceed the standards established for such products by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.

Allowing the conversion of life-insurance to long-term care insurance makes sense, especially for older workers. As an employee reaches his mature years, his requirements for financial security—both for himself and for his spouse and heirs—change. Rather than carrying a large life insurance policy, originally purchased to protect dependents, into retirement, many older employees would be better served if a portion of this coverage and the reserve funds associated with it could be converted to long-term care insurance. Long-term care expenses, as you know, can eat up a lifetime's worth of carefully planned retirement savings in a matter of months. Also, under this proposal, individuals who do need to retain large amounts of life-insurance could still opt for the conversion and purchase additional life protection under FEGLI.

By offering long-term care insurance benefits, in addition to protecting Federal workers, the Federal Government will help spur the development of the long-term care insurance market and encourage other employers to follow suit. While a handful of employers offer long-term care insurance coverage to their workers, these are almost exclusively large companies with benefit plans that can accommodate market uncertainty. Smaller employers have been unwilling to offer a benefit with so little actuarial data and claims experience, and insurers have not aggressively targeted such firms with their products. As a result, the long-term care insurance market is evolving toward individual policies which are, frankly, too expensive for most people to afford.

By taking the lead in sponsoring a long-term care insurance plan for its own employees, the Federal Government could serve as a model for other employers. At the same time, it would vastly expand the existing data base on pricing and utilization patterns for long-term care insurance. Finally, it would encourage development and competition among insurance carriers serving group business.

Mr. Speaker, this proposal serves the dual purposes of protecting our own workers against long-term care expenses and helping to nudge the long-term care insurance industry to full throttle. What's more, it won't cost the Treasury a dime. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

REINTRODUCTION OF THE FEDERAL EMPLOYEES LONG-TERM CARE INSURANCE ACT

HON. D. FRENCH SLAUGHTER, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, there is much the Federal Government can do to spur the demand and supply of private long-term care insurance. I believe such action is imperative because the Federal Government cannot solve the growing problem of financing long-term care without appealing to a substantial degree to the private sector.

One way the Federal Government can help is to offer group long-term care insurance on a voluntary basis to some of its 2.5 million workers. I introduced legislation last year to do precisely that, and I am reintroducing the same bill today along with eight of my colleagues: Mr. RINALDO, Mr. BURTON, Mrs. KENNELLY, Mr. MYERS of Indiana, Mr. HUGHES, Mrs. BENTLEY, Mr. LAGOMARSINO, and Mr. MEYERS of Kansas.

Under the terms of our bill, the Office of Personnel Management would select, through a competitive bidding process, several private insurance companies to participate in a new Federal employee group long-term care insurance program. This voluntary program would initially be open to the 650,000 Federal employees who are 50 years of age and older and their spouses, although it could be extended to all employees after 5 years.

Premiums for this insurance would be paid by each employee, but as an additional incentive to encourage participation, our bill would permit those insured under Federal group life insurance to voluntarily convert, on a tax-free basis, a portion of this policy to the new long-term care insurance program. This would enable participants to lower the monthly premium for their new long-term care insurance.

I believe this legislation would provide significant incentives for insurance companies to enhance their long-term care policies and for Federal employees to purchase attractive group policies at affordable rates. Finally, this program would encourage other businesses and State and local governments to offer similar policies to their employees, thereby increasing both the supply of and demand for long-term care insurance.

Senator PETE WILSON introduced the Senate version of this legislation last week with 36 original cosponsors, including Majority Leader MITCHELL and Minority Leader DOLE. We hope for quick action in the 101st Congress to provide this initial Federal response to a clear and growing national need: financing long-term health care.

INTRODUCTION OF THE HOME OWNERSHIP ASSISTANCE ACT

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I'm pleased to join my colleague from North Carolina, DAVID PRICE, in introducing the Home Ownership Assistance Act of 1989.

Since 1980, we have seen a dramatic decline in homeownership rates in the United States. While the percentage of decline over these years seem small—from 65.6 percent of households as homeowners to 63.8 percent—it still means that nearly 2 million fewer families own homes today than would have had the prior rate been sustained. For younger people, the decline has been particularly acute. The percentage of homeowners in the 25- to 29-year-old category has declined by 7.4 percent. For those between ages 30 and 34, the decline has been 7.9 percent.

Ironically, there are millions of Americans who can afford to pay the monthly mortgage on a home. The problem is that they can't come up with the large downpayments needed to qualify for a mortgage. Once inside the house, they can pay their mortgage. They just can't get their foot in the door to begin with.

The decline in homeownership is a particular problem for the State of Oregon. When we build fewer new homes, it means less work and fewer jobs for the timber and construction industries. When we sell fewer homes, it means a less vibrant real estate industry. And when the market slows up, it means we have less people contributing to our tax base and stimulating economic activity in general.

The legislation I am coauthoring today will make it easier for would-be home buyers to break into this tough market. The tool we use is the popular Federal Housing Administration [FHA], Single Family Mortgage Program. FHA is an especially popular program in Oregon. In the last fiscal year, for example, FHA insured 6,800—$360,000,000 worth—mortgages in our State. According to the Home Builders Association of Metropolitan Portland, approximately 85 pecent of first time buyers in our State use FHA.

Under current law, FHA insures 97 percent of the first $25,000 of a home and 95 percent of the balance. Thus, on a $100,000 home, FHA would insure $95,500, leaving the homebuyer to come up with a downpayment of $4,500. That amound could be prohibitive to many would-be homebuyers.

This bill would do the following:

For first-time homebuyers, the bill would permit FHA to insure 97 percent of the entire home valuation. This means that the buyer would only have to put down 3 percent or, in the example used above, $3,000;

For other homebuyers, the bill would allow FHA to insure 97 percent of the first $50,000 of the home's value and 95 percent of the balance. Under this formula, the person above would have to come up with a slightly lower downpayment of $4,000;

FHA would be authorized to perform a demonstration program allowing them to insure a loan to a first-time homebuyer for the entire purchase price of the home, plus closing costs. The standard downpayment would still be required, but it would be incorporated into the loan and be repaid by requiring an additional payment along with the regular monthly mortgage payment over a 3-year period;

FHA would be given more flexibility with adjustable rate mortgage. Under current law, FHA may insure ARM's whose interest rate can only be adjusted by 1 percent a year. And only 30 percent of all FHA loans can be ARM's. This bill would permit FHA to insure ARM's that can be adjusted by 2 percent a year. It stipulates that the interest rate could not increase by more than 5 percent over the lifetime of the loan. The bill also removes the volume cap on the aggregate number of ARM's that FHA may insure annually; and

Finally, the bill adjusts the FHA mortgage insurance limits in regions where moderate income families are being priced out of the housing market because the current limits do not allow FHA to insure the median priced house in that area.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation is not a panacea for America's housing crisis. There are other housing needs that must be addressed, such as the declining stock of low-income housing and rental units, and the plight of the homeless. But it's a response to one unique problem among the many housing problems we have in this country and I encourage my colleagues to support it.

ADVISORY COMMISSION ON PUBLIC DIPLOMACY SAYS TV MARTI NEEDS FURTHER REVIEW

HON. GEO. W. CROCKETT, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, the January 25 Washington Post reported that the U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy "Questioned whether plans for TV Marti, a United States Government television station broadcasting to Cuba, are in the national interest and urged Congress and the executive branch to give the project intense scrutiny before spending more money on it."

The Commission goes on to state, "TV Marti raises significant questions for public diplomacy and U.S. foreign relations. Is it consistent with U.S. obligations under international law? Is it technically feasible? What kind of programs should be broadcast? What are the implications for U.S. stations, communications and air traffic safety?"

These question were raised last year in a hearing of the Subcommittee on Western Hemisphere Affairs, which I have the honor to chair. I continue to feel that TV Marti is an ill-advised venture, and I urge my colleagues and the President to pay careful attention to the Commission's report.

The article referred to follows:

PANEL SAYS BALLOON TV SIGNALS TO CUBA MAY BE OFF THE BEAM: CASTRO JAMMING BROADCAST CITED AS A RISK

(By John M. Goshko)

The U.S. Advisory Commission on Public Diplomacy yesterday questioned whether plans for TV Marti, a U.S. government television station broadcasting to Cuba, are in the national interest and urged Congress and the executive branch to give the project intense scrutiny before spending more money on it.

The project calls for floating a balloon 10,000 feet above the Florida Keys so that TV Marti can broadcast everything from federally sanctioned news to Disney cartoons into downtown Havana.

However, critics have questioned whether the project justifies the risk of Cuban president Fidel Castro jamming it or retaliating with signals that would disrupt television stations in Flordia and pose potential hazards to air traffic in the region.

"TV Marti raises significant questions for public diplomacy and U.S. foreign relations," the commission said in its annual report. "Is it consistent with U.S. obligations under international law? Is it technically feasible? What kind of programs should be broadcast? What are the implications for U.S. television stations, communications and air traffic safety?"

These comments by the presidential commission were noteworthy because its five members generally espouse a tough line against communist governments.

Its chairman is Edwin J. Feulner, Jr., who is president of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative thinktank; the other members also have clearly conservative views.

In its report on the U.S. Information Agency and other public diplomacy activities, the commission took a decidedly skeptical approach to plans for following up the broadcasting activities of Radio Marti, which operates under USIA supervision with a companion TV service.

The commission noted that the $7.5 million appropriated by Congress for startup costs was diverted from the Voice of America, which has insufficient funds for long-planned construction and was adopted without authorizing legislation or hearings by the appropriate congressional committees.

As a result, the commission said, it believes strongly that additional appropriations should be authorized only after careful congressional hearings and further interagency review.

It also said any funds appropriated should not be at the expense of VOA or other public diplomacy projects.

INTRODUCTION OF THE CALIFORNIA DESERT PROTECTION ACT

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to once again introduce the California Desert Protection Act.

This measure is vitally important for two reasons. First, the California desert is a too little understood legacy to this country's natural and historical heritage. The California desert is a wilderness treasure which teems with mammals, birds and a blanket of wildflowers in the spring, and a living museum which has made time stand still.

Second, this legacy has been seriously damaged in recent years and now faces an imminent threat from careless development, troubling mismanagement, and reckless recreational use. Too often we are finding that mining claims go unreclaimed, that regulations to protect the desert go unenforced and that a reckless minority of ORV'ers go unchecked as they veer from designated play areas and roads destroying pristine wildlands.

This comprehensive public lands measure is a top priority for both myself and the environmental community in the 101st Congress. George T. Frampton, Jr. of the Wilderness Society says, "Enactment of the California Desert Protection Act in the 101st Congress is one of our top priorities." And Michael Fischer, executive director of the Sierra Club notes, "We have Sierra Club activists across the country working to educate lawmakers about the California desert, the threats to it, and the urgency of protecting it."

The California desert covers roughly one-quarter of the State, about 25 million acres, in the south eastern quadrant. Much of this land has been developed for agriculture, mining, raising cattle, national defense purposes, and recreational use. Sadly, not enough is being done to ensure that further development of the Bureau of Land Management's 12 million acres does not destroy the desert's vital ecological, historical, and natural resources. In addition, a reckless few are rapidly preventing the overwhelming majority of desert enthusiasts from enjoying untrampled, unlittered, and unspoiled wildlands.

The Federal Lands Protection and Management Act contemplated comprehensive management of the desert, including congressional designation of wilderness, to ensure the desert's permanent protection.

Our legislation facilitates such protection. It designates as wilderness, 81 separate roadless, pristine areas covering 4.5 million acres of BLM lands which are worthy of such status.

The measure also enacts highly appropriate and badly needed additions to the National Park System which the Western Region Park Service Office endorsed in 1986.

The bill creates the new Mojave National Park in the magnificent and historic Mojave Desert region covering 1.5 million acres. These BLM lands, currently known as the East Mojave national Scenic Area, are protected only by administrative regulations which have proven to be inadequate. As a result, the Mojave has experienced serious deterioration in certain areas over the last few years.

The bill also completes the Death Valley and Joshua Tree National Monuments by adding a total of 1.5 million contiguous acres. These additions conform to the naturally occurring ecological boundaries of the region. In addition, the bill upgrades the two monuments to national park status to afford them the statute and attention which these spectacular natural resources deserve. Of these new Park System additions, roughly two-thirds will be designated as wilderness to protect the most significantly pristine areas.

The measure also resolves several other outstanding land issues. It enacts a pending proposal to expand the Red Rock Canyon State Park by transferring 20,500 acres of BLM lands to the State of California. It establishes a national historic site at the Indian Canyons outside Palm Springs to be cooperatively managed by Interior and the Agua Caliente Band of Cahuilla Indians. Finally, it affords 2,040 acres special designation as the Desert Lily Sanctuary to protect this rare flower.

The bill is essentially the same as that introduced in the 100th Congress. This year, however, I have agreed to a number of significant changes which will resolve several important matters which were brought to my attention in the last Congress.

First, this measure addresses continued use of the desert for military purposes. There are a number of important military installations located in the desert. The Engle Act requires that the withdrawal of lands over 5,000 acres from other public uses for peacetime military purposes be authorized by Congress. Such withdrawal remains outstanding for two installations in the desert. The legislation resolves this by authorizing the withdrawal of these: The 1,100,000 acre China Lake Naval Weapons Center, and the 227,369 acre Chocolate Mountain Aerial Gunnery Range.

In addition, the bill has been amended to clarify that its provisions will have no impact on the military's existing use of airspace in the California desert. Existing military overflights have not impaired the park and wilderness value of the desert, and, as an important component of our Nation's military preparedness, should be protected.

Second, the bill has been amended to expedite land exchanges between the State and private landowners and the Federal Government. The bill's language which facilitates exchanges between the non-Federal landowners and the Federal Government has simply been changed to be consistent with legislation that passed in the 100th Congress that will facilitate all Federal land exchanges. More importantly, provisions have been added to expedite the exchanges of non-Federal lands where mineral interests may be involved. These provisions allow exchanges to take place based on the information available at the time, precluding the need for additional onsite geologic work.

Third, the bill provides that the Department of the Interior is to insure that native Americans continue to have access to park and wilderness lands for traditional cultural and religious uses.

Fourth, language has been included which clarifies that the University of California's research and educational activities at the Granite Mountain Natural Reserve in the Mojave will continue, consistent with the laws applicable to units of the Park System.

Finally, there are a number of boundary changes which were made to accommodate important nonwilderness uses and to correct several map errors. These changes are as follows:

Argus Wilderness—deletion of a road and limestone quarry.

Chuckwalla Mountains—deletion of microwave site, road, and mine.

Clipper Mountains—deletion of a road and pipeline.

Dead Mountains—deletion of a road and rock quarry.

Inyo Mountains—exclusion of mining claims.

Fish Creek—exclusion of mine.

Hollow Hills—deletion for utility corridor.

Jacumba—deletion of transmission line and quarry.

Kelso Dunes—deletion of gas pipeline.

Kingston Range—deletion for utility corridor.

Malpais Mesa—exclusion of mining claims.

Mecca Hills—deletion of pipeline and map correction to complete boundary.

Mesquite—deletion for utility corridor.

North Mesquite—deletion of private property.

Orocopia—exclusion for utility corridor.

Picacho Peak—addition of lands.

Piper Mountains—deletion for utility corridor.

Piute Mountains—deletion of gas pipeline.

Resting Spring—deletion of mining road.

Rodman—deletion of gas pipeline.

Slate Range—deletion of patented lands.

Soda Mountains—exclusion for utility corridor.

South Algodones Dunes—deletion of microwave tower.

Tribolite—deletion of gas pipeline.

White Mountains WSA—exclusion for utility corridor.

Mojave National Park—map correction.

Mojave Park Wilderness—deletion of gas pipeline in Granite Mountains portions; map correction and road deletion in Mid Hills portion; deletion of gas pipeline in Providence Mountains portion; and map correction and utility corridor and utility corridor deletion in Clark Mountains portion.

Joshua Tree Park additions and wilderness—deletion of mining claims in Eagle Mountains portion.

Red Rock Canyon State Park additions—map clarification.

All these changes have been made to insure that the bill does not conflict with existing and/or appropriate uses of the desert and to insure comprehensive management of the desert as a whole.

Our bill provides comprehensive, lasting protection of the desert's natural resources, and final resolution of the desert's many land use conflicts as FLPMA contemplated. While creating wilderness and adding to the Park System, it leaves roughly 4.6 million acres for continued management by the BLM under its multiple-use mandate, including mineral exploration and development, grazing, off-road vehicle use, and commercial land development. Over 400,000 acres of lands will remain as ORV play areas and 30,000 miles of half paved and maintained roads and half unmaintained routes will remain open.

The wilderness designations will ensure numerous recreational opportunities for generations to come, including hiking, camping, hunting, rock-climbing, horseback riding, and rockhounding. While mechanized travel is not permitted, motorized touring via roads which cherrystem the wilderness areas is—these are roads which go directly in or surround wilderness, but are not within the boundaries. In addition, grazing, mining on valid existing claims, scientific research, and educational activities are also permitted in wilderness areas. Outside the wilderness areas in the new park additions, vehicular travel along designated roads will continue, as will camping and hiking.

It is critical that Congress act with all deliberate speed to protect the desert as one of our truly spectacular national treasures. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important public lands measure in the 101st Congress.

SMALL BUSINESS COMMITTEE HEARINGS ON SECTION 89 EMPLOYEE BENEFIT RULES

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, last week the Committee on Small Business held 2 days of hearings on the impact of section 89 employee benefit rules on small business and their potential effect on the expansion of health insurance coverage.

Section 89 of the Tax Code, which took effect on January 1 as part of the 1986 Tax Reform Act, is intended to ensure that employer-sponsored benefit plans are broadly based and do not favor top-level employees. The new law requires all employers to conduct a series of complex statistical tests to determine if their employee benefit plans, principally health and group-term life insurance, are distributed fairly among their highly paid employees and the rank-and-file.

One of the principal objectives of section 89 is to encourage employers to extend health benefits to their part-time employees and other uninsured workers. While I fully support that objective, I am concerned—as are many other members of the Small Business Committee—that the law will likely have the opposite effect.

Those concerns were borne out by the statements of witnesses at our hearings on January 24 and 25. We heard testimony from business owners, representatives of small business associations, benefit plan administrators, accountants and other employee benefit experts who described the difficulties that employers, especially small business owners, would face in attempting to comply with section 89.

Several witnesses reported that small business owners may incur costs of up to $5,000, mostly due to data collection, in order to test their employee benefit plans. Compliance costs could be much higher, particularly for firms that will need to hire consultants. One witness cited the example of a company with less than 50 employees that paid $60,000 to an outside consultant to comply with section 89, with the result that the firm simply imputed $4,000 worth of income to its high paid employees.

The committee's witnesses also objected to the severe penalties imposed on employees if the employer's benefit plan fails to meet section 89's qualification requirements. In that case, the total value of benefits received under the plan would be included as taxable income for all participants, not just the highly compensated employees. If an employee underwent surgery and received benefits totaling $50,000, for example, that amount would be taxed as income if the benefit plan failed the law's qualification requirements.

In short, the witnesses all agreed that the extreme complexity of the benefits tests, the costly administrative requirements, and the onerous compliance burden imposed by section 89 will have an adverse impact on the expansion of health insurance coverage among the working uninsured. They stated that small business owners will be discouraged from offering health benefits and will be inclined to reduce or eliminate the benefits they now provide.

As Howard Weizmann, executive director of the Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans, commented, "The goals of the statute—increased tax equity and efficiency and health care coverage—are not attainable as the law is now drafted, because the statute cannot be reasonably complied with and enforced. As a result, it will be more economically feasible for employers to refuse to apply the law and simply impute income to highly compensated employees."

Many of the witnesses advocated repeal of section 89. They shared the view expressed by Paula Calimafde, president of the Small Business Council of America who stated that "Because of the significant complexity of the statute, the lack of experts in the country on this Code section, the draconian penalties imposed on employees with no culpability on their part, and the lack of information disseminated to the public by this government on section 89, it is highly desirable for repeal."

If the law is not repealed, the witnesses called for a 1-year delay in the effective date of section 89, or until 6 months after regulations have been issued, and for modifications in the rules to ease the compliance burden on small business. For example, the National Society of Public Accountants urged a simplified data collection and benefit valuation procedure for employers who do not offer multiple benefit plans. The Small Business Council of America [SBCA] recommended that a 6-month relief period be granted to allow employers to collect the necessary employee data and determine how best to structure their benefit plans, and that a study be undertaken on ways to streamline the nondiscrimination rules. The SBCA also proposed that all penalties be delayed for at least 1 year, and that the penalty imposed on employees if a plan fails the qualification requirements be eliminated entirely.

The Society of Professional Benefit Administrators suggested that collectively bargained plans be exempted, and that the phase-in for coverage of part-time workers be extended to 5 years and expanded to more employers. The Association of Private Pension and Welfare Plans recommended that the nondiscrimination rules be refocused to apply primarily to the so-called "executive only" plans, and that the rules be based upon plan design instead of data collection in order to promote both compliance and policy objectives.

These are only some of the constructive recommendations and alternative approaches suggested by our witnesses. They have offered to work with us and with the Committee on Ways and Means in an effort to find ways to simplify section 89 and ease the compliance burden on small business.

Mr. Speaker, when the hearing record is complete, I will provide all of the testimony and other relevant information to the Ways and Means Committee. I hope that committee will examine the problems that have been raised by the small business community in terms of their compliance with section 89, and will consider their recommendations to simplify the employee benefit rules.

Again, we all agree that discrimination against lower-paid workers in the provision of health benefits cannot be tolerated, and that the lack of health insurance coverage among millions of workers must be addressed. Based on the testimony before the Small Business Committee, however, section 89 must be simplified and made more workable if it is to achieve its intended objective of encouraging employers to extend health insurance coverage to their part-time and other lower paid workers.

PRICE COMPETITIVE PRODUCTS ACT

HON. ROD CHANDLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself, Mr. BRYANT, and Mr. FRENZEL, I am today introducing the Price Competitive Products Act of 1989.

Americans would be hard pressed to find a country that beats their own when it comes to the availability of consumer products. The majority of the goods most people want are affordable, reliable, and readily available.

It isn't until we examine products on a case-by-case basis that glaring exceptions become noticeable. Indeed, for consumers of some products, particularly foreign-made imports, there are occasional disadvantages to being American.

That is because foreign manufacturers often charge according to what they perceive is the customer's ability to pay. Americans are thought to have lots of money and therefore pay more for name brand products that sell for less in other markets.

Some of the products affected by this double standard are cameras, crystal, liquor, perfume, and watches.

The double standard has created a game of sorts between American retailers on the one hand and foreign manufacturers on the other.

The first volley in this multi-billion-dollar fight is fired from overseas. In an effort to ensure their profits, foreign manufacturers establish subsidiaries to be the sole American distributors of their products. These distributors, seeing America as a gold mine, mark up their goods to a level that far exceeds the price paid by the rest of the world.

The next shot is fired by enterprising American retailers who object to the exorbitant prices they must pay. Those with a little imagination and initiative strike back by bypassing the American distributors. Instead, they turn to foreign distributors who sell them what they want at enormous discount.

Items purchased in this manner are commonly referred to as "gray market" or "parallel" imports. Although retailers must pay a Customs duty on gray market imports, the savings still make it worth their while. Gray market items often are sold on the retail market at 20 to 40 percent below the manufacturers' suggested retail price.

Whether it comes from a discount store or an upscale boutique or department store, the merchandise is the same. The ability of retailers to purchase gray market products save American consumers billions of dollars each year.

Gray market access also is one of the reasons American consumers have seen a proliferation in catalog/showroom stores that offer genuine name-brand items at huge discounts.

Predictably, the gray market issue has created a controversy that's already found its way to the courts. In 1986, a Federal appeals court overturned the Custom Service's longstanding tolerance of gray market imports.

In round two, decided last May, the Supreme Court went the other way. In a 5–4 vote, the High Court said the Tariff Act of 1930 did not require the Customs Service to bar importation of most gray market merchandise.

Undeterred, foreign manufacturers say they will seek legislation or initiate more court proceedings to turn the tide again.

In the interest of consumer savings, I am introducing legislation that would go beyond the Supreme Court ruling by upholding the right of retailers to purchase gray market merchandise. While the Court said that gray market imports were not illegal, my bill specifically states that they would be legal.

Foreign manufacturers, who oppose the bill, say it is their right to control the distribution of their products.

They are correct only in the sense that "rights" are indeed the underlying issue. If they have the right to establish multi-tiered, international pricing structures, retailers have as much right to use the system to their best advantage. That is the American way.

Competition is healthy. It always has been; it always will be. It keeps producers on their toes and it gives consumers the most bang for their buck.

Government has no obligation or right to sanction monopolies for foreign companies charging the American consumer more than everyone else. The Government's first obligation is to its own people.

Parallel imports wield poetic justice against those who are unfair to the American consumer. Far from a danger, parallel imports are something the Government ought to encourage.

A CONCERN FOR VOCATIONAL AGRICULTURE

HON. WES WATKINS

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to express concern over the decline of vocational agriculture and Future Farmers of America programs in high schools across the Nation. At the same time I would like to pay tribute to a recent study and publication which not only shed light on the problem, but went further to document new local programs have found ways to grow and prosper, in spite of the challenges they face.

Vocational agriculture and FFA programs face many obstacles today. The farm economic crisis of the 1980's took a heavy toll on many rural communities. The population of farm families and rural towns has been shrinking, leading to a decline in enrollment and a lack of funding for school programs. Perhaps the biggest problem has been a negative image of agriculture in the eyes of many career-minded students.

Yet, the importance of agriculture—and of successful vocational agriculture programs for our rural youth—is obvious. There are good jobs available today in agriculture and agribusiness. And there has never been a greater time of need for energetic, skilled, and hard-working young people to fortify rural America. Vo-ag and FFA have long been among a choice few school programs which truly help rural young people understand the strengths, resources, and the opportunities that exist right in their local community.

Despite an overall decline in vo-ag and FFA, however, many programs are enjoying success. These high schools, their administrators and teachers, serve as examples to others and deserve commendation. A compilation of these success stories can be found in a new book, "Shining Stars," published by Communicating for Agriculture [CA]. CA is a national, nonprofit, nonpartisan rural association headquartered in Fergus Falls, MN. "Shining Stars" summarizes the results of a June 1988 CA survey of FFA State advisers and executive secretaries, provides hard evidence that teachers do make a difference and highlights 34 successful vocational agriculture and FFA programs from throughout the United States.

As stated by Milt Smedsrud, CA chairman and founder:

Ag teachers are often in challenging and frustrating situations. They may lack funding or administrative and school board support. Frequently it is difficult for them to convince counselors and parents that agriculture is an educational option that leads to employment opportunity * * * There are success stories in vocational agriculture and it turns out that there is no secret for success. The successes are due to the individual and team activities of enthusiastic, talented instructors who are able to look at changes as challenges.

"Shining Stars," funded by CA's Scholarship and Education Foundation, is a source book of information and ideas designed to inspire other vocational agriculture teachers to reach for excellence in their programs. "Shining Stars" is evidence of CA's continued efforts to preserve and strengthen rural America and its quality of life.

UKRAINIANS CELEBRATED 70TH ANNIVERSARY ON JANUARY 22, 1989

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, January 22, 1989 marked the 70th anniversary of the consolidation of all Ukrainian ethnic lands into one Republic and the 71st anniversary of the establishment of the Ukrainian National Republic in Kiev. Despite years of repression by the Soviet Union the love of democracy still lives on among Ukrainians.

Ukrainian-Americans and Ukrainian activists who remain in the Soviet Union continue to fight for an independent Ukrainian Republic. Throughout the United States, 100 Ukrainian parishes are recognized, unlike their counterparts in the Soviet Union which were liquidated by the Soviet Government in the 1930's. Not only do Ukrainians dream of their homeland escaping Soviet bondage one day, they also continue to remember the "forgotten holocaust" when, because of famines, over 6 million Ukrainians lost their lives in the 1930's at the hands of the Soviet Government.

Temporary human rights measures are not enough. We must encourage the Soviet Union to allow the nationalities greater freedom of expression, to release prisoners of conscience, and to greatly expand the rights of individuals.

As Members of Congress, we must remain strongly committed to our belief in the human rights principle of basic freedom for all and we must continue to support persecuted groups, such as the Ukrainians, who dream of living in a democratic society.

REJECT THE FINDINGS OF THE BASE CLOSURE COMMISSION

HON. JIM SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to sound an alarm, to warn my colleagues in the House that they should not accept carte blanche the recommendations of the Commission on Base Closures and Realignments.

Quite bluntly, Mr. Speaker, the Commission's findings are flawed, seriously flawed, and this great body's predisposition to accept those findings would wrongly disrupt the lives of thousands of individuals.

Oh, I know I have colleagues in the House who will scoff and point out that I speak as a Member who was directly wounded by the Commission's report. That is entirely true. But if my investigation into the recommendation for Fort Dix is reflective of the Commission's findings generally, then we have before us a report which should be outright rejected.

Just this week, Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of the Commission's purported backup documentation, the data which was supposed to justify its decisions. But I defy any Member of the House to look at this 2-inch stack of documents and say it accomplishes its purpose. In fact, the Commission's documents do not explain its decision with regards to Fort Dix—it only obscures it.

In virtually every instance where Fort Dix is mentioned, major portions of information are whited out. We have actually been denied access not only to the facts, but to the reasoning. The Commission, I suppose, would suggest that this information is classified. But a discussion of training capacity at our military bases is no secret to anyone.

A Member of this House or the other body who attempts to use the Commission's documentation to argue in favor of the Commission's recommendation faces a difficult task indeed. How does one explain the blank graphs and charts. That's right, Mr. Speaker, blank charts.

Again, I know that I have good friends on both sides of the aisle who will argue, "Well, we do have to reduce our spending." I certainly don't disagree with that.

But I will also say to my friends that when we create a Commission we are primarily asking for a proposal. We do not remove ourselves from the process, and automatically accept that Commission's proposal. If the proposal has problems, we cannot and should not accept it.

With each passing day, Mr. Speaker, I am alerted to more and more reasons why the recommendations of the Commission on Base Closures and Realignments must be discarded. Perhaps one of the most interesting documents to fall in my hands is an audit of basic training by the U.S. Army Audit Agency.

I am sure that the last thing the Commission would want is for me to come before this body and tell it about this audit. The reason the Commission would probably prefer this not be disclosed is that it directly contradicts the findings of the Commission with regard to basic training. It contradicts those findings even though both the Commission, and the audit agency, set out to do the same thing—save taxpayers' money.

To be specific, the audit states that there is excess basic training space at Fort Dix and recommends that trainees be transferred from Fort Knox and Fort Leonard Wood to Fort Dix and Fort Jackson—just the opposite of the Commission's recommendation.

The best part about the audit agency's report is that it was prepared at essentially the same time as the Commission's report—and nothing is whited out in the audit.

Again, I know my colleagues want to save money, and I am prepared to talk in depth about the dollar figures. But for the moment I will close by pointing to one significant fact, namely the Commission's proposed savings represent two-hundredths of 1 percent of the defense budget.

When we put this Commission to work we were all anticipating it would find savings of $2 billion to $5 billion a year. But the Commission did its work, and came back with $5.6 billion of savings over 20 years. In other words, we missed the target not by a mile, but by many miles.

Is it worth discarding $160 million to $200 million in improvements already made at Fort Dix? Is it worth spending upward of $245 million, much of which will be used to modernize the other bases which will accept Fort Dix personnel and trainees? Is it worth paying several millions a year just to keep Fort Dix "in mothballs?" Is it worth disrupting a local business community, displacing workers, and spending even more millions in grants and aid to salvage the economic community which will be destroyed?

The answer is clear, Mr. Speaker. The recommendations of the Commisison must be rejected.

BARBARA WALKER, 1989 TEXAS ELEMENTARY TEACHER OF THE YEAR

HON. JACK FIELDS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to an outstanding individual who recently was named the 1989 Texas Elementary Teacher of the Year by the Texas Education Agency. Barbara Walker is a music teacher at Cimarron Elementary in the Galena Park Independent School District.

Barbara Walker was first nominated for the district top teaching honor by a panel of her fellow teachers. On October 9, she was recognized as Texas Elementary Teacher of the Year by a panel of judges representing various State organizations. Her interview was sandwiched between two weekend performances of the Houston Grand Opera production of "Figaro," in which she sang.

Teaching is only one way Barbara Walker has contributed to her community. Some of her other accomplishments include: Outstanding Young Woman of America, North Channel Chamber of Commerce Teacher of the Month, and Texas PTA Life Member.

Barbara Walker's awards are many, but the principal of Cimarron Elementary says, "* * * her best performances are in the classroom." She has taught at Cimarron Elementary School for the past 6 of her 7 year teaching career.

Those of us familiar with the educational excellence of the Galena Park ISD know that under the leadership of Barbara Walker that that tradition of excellence will continue in the years ahead. I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate Barbara Walker on her much-deserved honor and extend a personal thank you for her dedication to our country's youth.

TRIBUTE TO CLIFFORD C. VAN DYKE

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask my colleagues to join with me and the Boys and Girls Club of Bay County, MI, in honoring Clifford C. Van Dyke of Bay City for his many years of active involvement in the civic affairs of the Bay County area. We acknowledge Cliff's tireless efforts over the years to help attract new business and economic development to Bay County and we point with pride to him as a shining example of the kind of selfless dedication on the part of one individual that can make such a difference in the life of our community.

Currently chairman of the board of First of America Bank—Bay City, Cliff's accomplishments in the field of banking are matched only by his tremendous accomplishments in contributing to the well being of Bay City and Bay County. He has served with distinction as a member of the downtown development corporation and Forward Bay County. And, in 1987 he was elected as president of the Bay County Growth Alliance, a position in which he currently serves. Similarly, he has maintained an active commitment and role in bettering our community's schools, now serving on the citizens advisory committee for the Bay City Public Schools.

His long record of accomplishments in the Bay City area drew notice in Lansing when Gov. James Blanchard named Cliff in 1983 to serve on the Michigan Economic Recovery Plan Committee.

Cliff's efforts extend beyond the business and economic development fields to the charitable. A longtime volunteer with United Way of Bay County, he served as chairman of the 1980 fall campaign and was the 1985 recipient of the prestigious Carl H. Webber Award for volunteerism.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have known Cliff for many years and consider him to be a good friend. I have come to value most highly his information and strategies for dealing with the business and economic development needs of Bay County. His service to the community provides an outstanding example for us all; and I look forward to many more years of his active involvement and his invaluable counsel.

AN AMENDMENT TO THE DELAWARE RIVER BASIN COMPACT

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation to create a fair, equitable, and innovative cost-sharing program for the construction of the Francis E. Walter water storage project.

The reservoir is located in my congressional district in northeastern Pennsylvania and will help meet the water resource requirements of the residents, farmers, and industries in the four States of the Delaware River Basin—Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and Delaware.

Situated in this basin and high in the headwaters of Pennsylvania's Lehigh River, the Francis E. Walter Reservoir will store an additional 70,000 acre-feet of water to insure that the four States in the basin will enjoy an adequate supply of fresh water well into the future.

Mr. Speaker, this water storage project will also play a vital role in preventing the salt front of the Atlantic Ocean from advancing into the Delaware River and eroding the public water systems in Philadelphia, PA and Camden, NJ. Understandably, local officials, citizens, environmental groups, and water resource management associations have been concerned about the supply of fresh water in the Delaware Basin for many years.

I share their conviction, Mr. Speaker, that it is far more prudent to insure that we have an adequate supply of water in the region today, than it is to wait until we have a major drought emergency and discover that the cost of building a new reservoir has grown astronomically.

You well know, Mr. Speaker, that this past summer's unfortunate drought and the absence of snowfall in the Northeast this winter highlight our collective concern about fresh water supply. In the Delaware River Basin, the threat of a major drought is a serious concern and merits our prompt attention.

As you may know, the Delaware River Basin watershed is the major water source for more than 20 million residents in these four Northeastern States, from New York City to Wilmington, DE.

Before describing the specific provisions of my legislation, Mr. Speaker, a brief history of the Francis E. Walter project may be helpful and informative. The Francis E. Walter reservoir, first authorized by Congress as a flood control project in 1946, was named in honor of one of this body's most notable Members—an active and outspoken member of the Committee on the Judiciary from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Shortly after the Army Corps of Engineers completed construction of the project in 1961, Congress recognized the potential benefit to storing additional water at this site. Accordingly, in 1962 Congress authorized the enlargement of this public storage supply in Public Law 87-874, consistent with the cost-sharing terms of the Water Supply Act of 1958.

Also by this time, Mr. Speaker, the Delaware River Basin Commission [DRBC] was created by Public Law 87-328, and comprised of representatives from the four States in the basin and one Federal member appointed by the President. The DRBC was charged with managing the water resources for this four-State region and it continues to do so today.

In 1985, Mr. Speaker, the Army Corps of Engineers completed the engineering, design, and environmetal impact reports for this addition and the local sponsor, the Delaware River Basin Commission, affirmed its intent in August of the same year to execute a cost-sharing agreement to finance the Francis E. Walter project.

The DRBC recognized in 1985 that the cost-sharing provisions of the 1958 Water Supply Act applied to the Francis E. Walter project. Specifically, the DRBC understood that the 1958 act enumerated the terms for repayment for a project that is intended for both "present" and "future demand": prompt repayment of the Federal cost of the storage portion used to meet "present demand" and delayed repayment of the Federal cost of the project's portion allocated for meeting "future demand."

This policy was sound, Mr. Speaker, for it did not force present water users to pay for a project that they would never use. Rather, the Federal Government would pay initially for the "future" portion of the project and those future water users would reimburse Uncle Sam.

In fact, the orginal authorization for the Francis E. Walter project stated that two-thirds of the water supply storage was allocated to "future demand."

After completion of the Army Corps studies, Congress followed with an appropriation for construction of the Francis E. Walter project with the expectation that the payment agreement would be forthcoming.

When such a cost-sharing agreement was still not established by June 1988, the Energy and Water Appropriations Committee included an admonition in its conference report for fiscal year 1989 appropriations. The committee proclaimed that unless a payment commitment is made, "* * * in advance of action on the 1990 appropriation bill, the committees will be forced to carefully review the need for further appropriations."

That is why I rise today, Mr. Speaker, with a bill to create a cost-sharing formula so that the Francis E. Walter project may move forward. I can understand the Appropriation Committee's concerns in this era of fiscal restraint. And I can also see that the Delaware River Basin can ill afford to lose the water supply that will be stored at the Francis E. Walter Reservoir.

Essentially, Mr. Speaker, my bill structures the payment scheme into three sections.

In the first section, my bill designates that one-third of the Francis E. Walter water supply storage is allocable to "future demand" and financed initially by the Federal Government as is authorized in existing law. As I mentioned, the original authorization for the Francis E. Walter project stipulated that two-thirds of the water supply was to be allocated to "future demand."

In the second section, the bill provides that charges and assessments—cited in the Delaware River Basin Compact's sections 3.7 and 4.3—be applied to present water users. This measure will provide funding for the second-third of the project.

In regard to this payment assessed to present water users, my bill clearly states that the finances are solely for the purpose of financing the Francis E. Walter authorized project. Mr. Speaker, no changes to the compact for the purpose of funding the Francis E. Walter project in any way alter the provisions of section 15.1(a) of the compact, including those prohibiting the DRBC from assessing present users for a project that has not been authorized by Congress.

In the final third of this payment plan, the signatory parties to the compact will finance approximately 33 percent of the project cost.

The bill I have introduced today also provides that a portion of the water stored in the Francis E. Walter Reservoir may be used in the northeastern Pennsylvania counties of Luzerne, Lackawanna, Carbon, and Monroe. The first two counties lie just outside the Delaware River Basin and the latter two are within the basin.

This water supply provision for northeastern Pennsylvania is especially important for the health and safety of local residents and farmers who have experienced giardiasis problems in the past from poor water quality.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, this water supply will provide a tremendous boost to economic development and job growth as companies and families will be attracted to our area when they learn that we have an excellent and reliable source for fresh water.

The availability of water in northeastern Pennsylvania—and the Delaware River Basin's water has been rated as first rate—will serve as a magnet to attract industries and to create new jobs.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it is both unjust and unfair to store water in northeastern Pennsylvania and to prevent residents or industries situated just over the mountain range in an adjacent watershed from using any of it.

Without this water set-aside provision, the district and region in which the Francis E. Walter Reservoir is located are surrendering a large tract of land for the project but receive little compensation.

Mr. Speaker, the legal principle of "Area of Origin" states that if a project area is the site for water storage which benefits an entire Basin area, then that Basin area owes something to the project area for storing the water. Clearly, the conditions underlying the Francis E. Walter project—and the bill's provision to allow additional Pennsylvania counties to have access to a portion of the supply—are consistent with this legal theory.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, you should know that in Pennsylvania's 11th Congressional District, there already exist three reservoirs that are storing water to be used in neighoring States.

There is a dynamic history to water supply and interstate conflicts over water rights in the Delaware River Basin. These issues have been reviewed by the Supreme Court twice.

As Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote in 1931 on this matter, "A river is more than an amenity, it is a treasure. It offers a necessity of life that must be rationed among those who have power over it."

Mr. Speaker, I look forward to working with my colleagues on this bill and urge their support so that we may respond to the pressing needs and concerns of the residents, farmers, and industries in the Delaware River Basin.

A BILL TO AMEND PUBLIC LAW 87-328, GRANTING THE CONSENT OF CONGRESS TO THE DELAWARE RIVER BASIN COMPACT AND MAKING THE UNITED STATES A SIGNATORY MEMBER THEREOF

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Sec. 2. At the end of Subsection 15.1(b) of Part II of Public Law 87-328 (75 Stat. 688) add the following two sentences:

"Nothing in this reservation prevents the Commission from imposing charges authorized by Compact Section 3.7 involving use of water within the Basin for purposes other than commercial navigation, or assessments authorized by Compact Section 4.3 for stream regulation therein: Provided, That the portion of the Francis E. Walter Project water supply storage cost made allocable to future demand by Public Law 87-874 be one-third, and not less than two-thirds of such storage portion be available for use in the Pennsylvania counties of Luzerne, Lackawanna, Carbon, and Monroe; Provided further, That the one-third of said Project's water supply storage cost allocable to present demand in H. Doc. 87-522 be met by Section 3.7 charges for present consumptive water demand and Section 4.3 assessments for present actual stream regulation benefits to water users; And provided further, That the remaining portion of its water supply storage cost not met by such charges and assessments be met by signatory parties as provided by Commission Resolution 64-16A adopted December 29, 1964. Nothing in this reservation alters the provisions of reservation (a), including those prohibiting the Commission from undertaking any project, other than one financed only with State-supplied funds, except as authorized by Congress."

COMMEMORATING UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. THOMAS J. MANTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. MANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to commemorate the 71st anniversary of the Ukrainian Declaration of Independence. Although the Ukraine has been under the control of the Soviet Union since World War II, the Ukrainian people have continually rejected assimilation and annexation by the Soviet Union.

The Ukraine has a long history of independent rule. On January 21, 1918, the Ukrainian Central Council issued the Fourth Universal of the Ukrainian National Republic declaring the Ukraine's of unconditional independence. During this period the Ukraine was a thriving democracy. The Ukraine issued its own currency, was a founding member of the United Nations, and embraced the idea of individual liberty by granting Ukrainians freedom of speech, press, religion, and assembly.

Unfortunately, the signing of the Molotov-Ribbentropp Pact between Hitler and Stalin signaled the end of the independent Ukrainian republic. After World War II, the Ukraine was incorporated in the Soviet Union. Stubbornly, the Ukrainian people have not given up the hope for attaining freedom and independence during their long occupation by the Soviet Union. Since the 1960's, there have been protesters and activists willing to risk imprisonment for the sake of Ukrainian nationalism.

Today, prospects have brightened for the Ukraine. Mikhail Gorbachev has allowed Ukrainians greater liberty. Recently, Ukrainian historians have been permitted to publish reports documenting the starvation of the Ukrainian people orchestrated by Stalin during the early 1930's. Before the advent of glasnost this kind of candid journalism would have been a punishable offense. Ukrainian writers are also now free to write about Stalin's purges of the Catholic church.

The Ukraine is still far from free, however. Last year, while the world's Christians celebrated the millenium of Christianity in the Ukraine, Ukrainian Catholics could not, because their church is outlawed in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, as we commemorate the anniversary of this day of freedom in Ukrainian history, I hope we can look forward to more such joyous events in the future—to the day when Ukrainians may once again speak and worship freely.

A TRIBUTE TO BATTLE CREEK CATHOLIC SCHOOLS

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay special tribute to the Battle Creek area Catholic schools on the occasion of Catholic Schools Week. I also want to take this opportunity to acknowledge the significant contributions that Catholic schools have made to so many of my constituents and to recognize the Battle Creek Catholic school participants—the students and their parents, the teachers, and the administrative and support staff—for their demonstrated vision, compassion, perseverance, and courage.

Catholic schools play a significant role in the United States of America by providing young people with a basic moral, educational, and spiritual foundation. In fulfilling this four-fold mission of vision, compassion, perseverance, and courage, the Battle Creek area Catholic schools serve to strengthen the moral fabric of the community and to reaffirm the historic American right to freedom of religion.

In enhancing the spiritual well-being and scholastic abilities of over 3 million students nationwide, Catholic schools have had a major and lasting impact on the quality of life in our great country. In preparing future generations to become concerned and committed citizens, Catholic schools are deserving of the highest commendation.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that my colleagues will want to join me in saluting the Battle Creek area Catholic schools for their outstanding contribution. I am honored to represent those who, through their contribution to these schools, have demonstrated their commitment to quality education and to the future of their community.

THE GUILFORD FOUR

HON. JOSEPH P. KENNEDY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, in a long overdue decision, the British Government agreed on January 16 to review the case of the Guilford Four.

The Guilford Four—Patrick Armstrong, Gerard Conlon, Paul Hill, and Carole Richardson—were convicted for the 1974 bombings of two pubs in England. Five people were killed and 65 people were injured in the bombings.

Despite numerous irregularities and inconsistencies and a complete lack of physical or forensic evidence, the four were convicted in 1974—primarily on the basis of their confessions. A group of IRA bombers later said that they committed the crime. The four have steadfastly asserted their innocence. They have appealed their case on the grounds that their confessions were not voluntary.

The dubious case against the Guilford Four has led prominent political and church leaders to take up their cause. Despite all of this support, the four have languished in prison for 15 years with little reason for hope—the Court of Appeal rejected their claims of innocence in 1977. And when the Court of Appeal rejected the Birmingham Six appeal in 1988 it looked particularly bleak for Armstrong, Conlon, Hill, and Richardson.

The Home Secretary, Douglas Hurd, cited new evidence when he instructed the Court of Appeal to take another look at the case. The new evidence involved the use of drugs during the interrogation of Richardson, a long-term drug user.

I join the Government of Ireland and others who are concerned about justice in applauding this long overdue decision. Given the Court of Appeal decision in the Birmingham Six appeal, this decision is not reason for unbridled optimism. It is only the first step toward justice for the Guilford Four. Let us hope that the Court of Appeal follows through on its responsibility and grants the Guilford Four the freedom they deserve.

TRUST IN OUR BIOLOGICAL OBJECTIVES

HON. WAYNE OWENS

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. OWENS of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing a bill to require the Secretary of Defense to identify, on an annual basis, the biological agents that are being used in the Biological Defense Research Program. Under the terms of this legislation, a complete list will be published in the Federal Register at the end of each fiscal year.

The Biological Defense Research Program has been the subject of ongoing controversy and suspicion. Here in the United States, many scientists and concerned citizens have questioned both the objectives and safety of a rapidly growing biodefense program. Internationally, there is mounting fear that the United States may be moving toward producing biological weapons in violation of the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention.

The Department of Defense assures us that such fears are without foundation. But even Department of Defense witnesses, testifying at a hearing I conducted last May, have admitted that the Biological Research Program should be made more open in order to relieve suspicion. By providing an accessible list of the biological agents with which we are doing research, we will be taking an important first step toward encouraging that openness and restoring trust in our biological objectives.

PLIGHT OF PORNOGRAPHY ON AMERICA

HON. MICHAEL BILIRAKIS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BILIRAKIS. Mr. Speaker, I stand here today before my colleagues to denounce what I consider a plight on the very fabric of our society: pornography. When our ancestors fled the oppression of the Old World for the freedoms of the new one, they were not in search of a debased society wallowing in its own perverseness.

Last week, convicted murderer Ted Bundy attributed his heinous acts to the abuse of alcohol and pornography. I cannot attest to the veracity of this statement from one of the most horrible criminals in America's history, but we repeatedly see more and more evidence of violence against women as a result of pornography.

I am and will always continue to be a supporter of free speech with all the fervor I can muster; however, the abuse of children and the explicit depiction of sexual acts for indiscriminate consumption without any regard for the values of the community is intolerable. We must continue with our fight to keep this filth out of our homes, schools, streets, and neighborhoods. I will continue to support legislation to restrict the interstate commerce of pornography and its dissemination in ways accessible to children.

THE FAIRNESS IN BARGAINING ACT OF 1989

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, Congressman TAUKE and I today have introduced, The Fairness in Bargaining Act of 1989, to provide needed clarification of the terms of renewal for franchises in the petroleum industry. One of the original goals of the Petroleum Marketing Practices Act [PMPA], was to set rules for negotiations between the big oil companies and the individual independent service station dealers who sell brand name gasoline under a franchise agreement. In practice, however, the PMPA failed to create a fair balance between large oil companies and the service stations. Experience under present law demonstrates that large oil companies still have the ability to make dramatic changes in the terms of franchise agreements, or abandon outright any agreements they decide are no longer serving their interests. This leaves the gas station operator little if any recourse, except to give in—even if it means going out of business.

The legislation we have introduced would strengthen the dealer's negotiating position in three ways. First, it requires all changes in franchise agreements to be fair and reasonable. This gives the gas station operator a right to seek redress from the courts in these cases which would cause damage to their business. The prospect of court oversight and redress is critical to strengthen the negotiating position of the small business. It would help restore the traditional American value which holds that each party in the negotiation should have the ability to bargain effectively for a mutually beneficial contract.

Second, this legislation requires all economically necessary contracts between the franchisee and franchisor to be included under fair and reasonable provison. By explicitly reaching essential aspects of the relationship, the gas station dealer would be able to bargain in full confidence that agreements will not be undercut by changes in other separate contracts such as the terms of credit card purchases.

Third, in cases where the franchise is located on property leased from a third party, this bill would grant the gas station operator an opportunity to reach his own agreement with the landowner in the event the franchisor is unable to renew his lease on the land. This provision is common in other businesses and affords each dealer the same chance to remain in business if they are able to arrange an equitable agreement to use the land on which the station is operating.

With these changes in the PMPA, the independent neighborhood service station could maintain neighborhood independent businessman in the service station industry. Since the rise of the petroleum industry in the early 1900's independent small businesses have been the standard of neighborhood service stations. That kind of independent service-oriented business must be preserved.

In the 100th Congress, this legislation had 83 cosponsors and was approved by the Energy and Commerce Committee. I hope this bill will achieve even greater success in this Congress. I urge my colleagues to support passage of this bill.

RETURN TO STRONGER 5-MPH AUTO BUMPER PROTECTION STANDARD

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation I proposed during each of the last three Congresses to restore automobile bumper protection standards to the 5 mile-per-hour requirement which was in force when the Reagan administration took office.

Beginning in 1978, new cars were equipped with bumpers capable of withstanding any damage in accidents occurring at 5 miles per hour or less. This was done in accordance with the the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act of 1972 which requires the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration [NHTSA] to set a bumper standard that seeks to obtain the maximum feasible reduction of costs to the public and to the consumer.

However, as part of the Reagan administration's effort to ease the so-called regulatory burden on the automobile industry, NHTSA reduced the standard to 2.5 miles per hour in 1982, claiming that lighter, weaker bumpers would cost less to install and replace, and would provide better fuel economy. This supposedly meant a consumer would save money over the life of a car, since the lower purchase and fuel costs should outweigh the occasionally higher cost of an accident. The administration promised, at the time, to provide bumper data to consumers, so that car buyers could make informed choices about the amount they wished to spend for extra bumper protection.

None of these economic benefits has materialized. Not only is the Government ignoring the consumers' need for adequate, accessible crash safety and damage information by making bumper and crash test information difficult for new car purchasers to find, but there is virtually no evidence that the car makers have reduced prices on cars they have equipped with the weaker bumpers. Adding insult to injury, the new bumpers weigh about the same as the older ones and thus save nothing on fuel costs.

Most importantly, consumers are spending hundreds of millions of dollars in extra repair costs and higher insurance premiums because of the extra damage incurred in slow speed accidents. In 5-mile-per-hour crash tests done each year by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety [IIHS], cars with the weaker bumpers sustain up to $3,000 in needless damage with absolutely none of the compensating benefits promised by NHTSA.

There is no doubt that consumers overwhelmingly favor a stricter bumper standard. In a 1982 survey conducted for IIHS 78 percent of those asked said they preferred 5-mile-per-hour bumpers to 2.5-mile-per-hour bumpers when they were told that the weaker bumpers would save gas, and lower the price of a new car, but would increase insurance collision prices by 10 to 20 percent. Surely no one buying a new car would prefer the extra inconvenience and cost associated with damage sustained in low-speed accidents with weaker bumpers to the very minor additional cost, if any, of stronger bumpers.

Both the Consumers Union, which has petitioned NHTSA unsuccessfully to rescind the change, and the Center for Auto Safety strongly support Federal legislation requiring a return to the 5-mile-per-hour standard. The insurance industry also strongly believes that rolling back the bumper standard was an irresponsible move, and both the American Insurance Association and the Alliance of American Insurers, two of the industy's largest trade organizations, support this measure as a way of controlling auto insurance costs.

Mr. Speaker, the administration made a serious, costly mistake when it rolled back the bumper standard. It has cost consumers many millions of dollars, with no offsetting benefit at all. Some manufacturers have continued to supply the stronger bumpers voluntarily, but consumers have no easy way of knowing whether cars have the stronger or weaker bumpers.

Re-establishing the 5-mile-per-hour bumper standard would be one of the wisest and easiest measures Congress could take this year to help alleviate the automobile insurance crisis that car owners are currently facing. We can save consumers millions of dollars by a proven regulation that worked well in actual practice only a few years ago. We cannot allow rhetoric about the burden of Government regulation and the advantages of free market economics to blind us to the reality of the economic and human costs of automobile accidents. It is up to Congress to restore rationality to automobile bumper protection standards.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this simple, straightforward bill.

A SALUTE TO THE KIWANIS CLUB OF POTTSVILLE

HON. GUS YATRON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues a very important event which will take place on February 27, 1989. The Kiwanis Club of Pottsville will celebrate 70 years of service—70 years of helping and bettering the community. The Pottsville Club was the 98th Kiwanis organization chartered in Kiwanis International; the worldwide membership of this proud organization now numbers more than 8,500 local clubs.

The Kiwanis Club of Pottsville was originally a men's organization but currently has more than 70 men and women from a variety of professions and business pursuits. Among the activities of the Pottsville Club are participation in the Schuylkill County senior charity basketball game, and interest in special Olympics. The club annually honors the outstanding vocal and instrumental music students at Pottsville and Nativity BVM High Schools, as well as the senior boy and girl who have contributed the most to their community in volunteer service. The club has also provided support for youth sports activities and combines with local agricultural organizations to sponsor a farm-city dinner.

Throughout the years, many citizens and local organizations have benefited from the club's fundraising ventures, including the Salvation Army, YWCA, Pottsville Free Public Library, and others.

Each of the members of the Kiwanis Club of Pottsville who have helped to make the organization what it is today can be justifiably proud of all its many accomplishments. The club has known a productive and rewarding past and I hope that they will continue to be met with the same degree of success in future endeavors. I know that my colleagues will want to join me in congratulating the Kiwanis Club of Pottsville on this 70th anniversary and join also in wishing them the very best in the years to come.

U.S. POLICY TOWARD EL SALVADOR: TIME FOR A FRESH START

HON. GERRY E. STUDDS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, February 2, 1989

Mr. STUDDS. Mr. Speaker, from January 6 to January 11, I visited the small Central American nation of El Salvador. During my 5 days in the country, we met with a broad range of political, military, religious and community leaders, including President Jose Napoleon Duarte, the leading candidate in the Presidential election scheduled for March, and labor leaders from the left to the right of the political spectrum.

After leaving El Salvador, I continued on to Costa Rica for 2 days of talks with political leaders in that country, including President and Nobel Prize winner Oscar Arias.

I was accompanied, on the El Salvador leg of the trip, by a distinguished group of American labor leaders including Mr. Jack Sheinkman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union; Mr. William Wimpisinger, president of the Machinist and Aerospace Workers; Mr. Gary Moore, vice president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees; and Mr. Don Stillman, of the staff of the United Auto Workers.

The following is a summary of my findings and recommendations about U.S. policy toward El Salvador based on my visit to these two countries, and on events since that time.

BACKGROUND

President Duarte once said that El Salvador's history consisted of "50 years of lies, 50 years of injustice, and 50 years of frustration." It is a history, he said "of a people starving to death, living in misery. For 50 years, the same people have had all the power, all the money, all the jobs, all the opportunities."

And throughout those 50 years, all the people of El Salvador heard from the United States was silence.

It was not until the beginning of this decade, after the Sandinistas raised the specter of region-wide Marxist revolution, that we began to pay serious attention to El Salvador. That country, with its history of social inequality, its corrupt and brutal military, and its increasingly active and militant left was as logical a candidate for revolution as this hemisphere has ever seen.

And so, beginning in 1981, we swamped El Salvador with economic and military aid; advised them on every subject from counter-insurgency to political advertising; lectured them about human rights; plied them with democratic rhetoric; and paralyzed them with delegations of Congressmen nosing about, looking for easy answers. For many, that easy answer came when Napoleon Duarte was elected President in 1984; for after that election, we declared our policy toward El Salvador a success and turned our attention with even less effect to Nicaragua.

Now, after 5 years, the Central American spotlight is shifting back to El Salvador; the high hopes that accompanied Duarte's election have been disappointed; and in place of those easy answers, we are confronted once again with some very difficult questions.

the $3 billion we have provided in economic and military aid to El Salvador since 1981 have helped that country to survive, but not to progress. The civil war is now in its ninth year. The standard of living has dropped by one-third. There is no system of justice. The armed forces remain a law unto themselves. Duarte's own political party has been discredited by allegations of corruption. Duarte, himself, is dying of cancer. And the party most likely to win the Presidential election scheduled for March was founded by right wing terrorists led by Maj. Roberto D'Aubuisson.

According to the U.S. Embassy in San Salvador, "the trends are good." According to virtually every Salvadoran I talked to during my visit, even the limited progress of the last few years is in danger of slipping away.

In recent months, violence has increased on the part of both extremes. To cite just one sequence, the guerrillas bombed the Defense Ministry in December; so someone, probably the military, bombed the Lutheran church. Then, someone bombed the National University, and the guerrillas bombed the Treasury police. All year, the guerrillas have been killing and threatening to kill municipal officials; so this past Christmas, a right wing group promised to begin killing two guerrilla sympathizers for every one victim of leftist violence.

Like Lebanon, El Salvador seems to have the capacity to make a hopeless situation progressively worse. The tit-for-tat terrorism of recent months advances the goals of neither side; but it is symptomatic of a larger military stalemate that has persisted for 8 years. The Army is tied down guarding fixed installations; the guerrillas can't risk large-scale operations in the face of the military's air power. The motto of both sides seems to be that if you can't beat the other guy on the battlefield, at least you can kill his friends.

Meanwhile, El Salvador remains an economic basketcase. Our aid, as large as it has been, only equals the damage done to the Salvadoran economy by the war. Despite the killing and the massive emigration of refugees, the population of El Salvador continues to grow at a rate that could not be sustained even in the best of times. Production of coffee—the nation's only major export—has dropped by 40 percent. And unemployment and underemployment is estimated at more than 50 percent.

THE CENTRAL ISSUE: WAR AND PEACE

During my visit, Salvadorans from all sides declared both their desire for peace and their pessimism that a realistic framework for negotiating peace would be found. For years, negotiations have been stymied by the guerillas' demand for a share of political power, and by the government's demand that the guerrillas put down their arms and respect the electoral process.

During my visit, U.S. Ambassador Bill Walker told me emphatically that he would not urge elected Salvadoran leaders to negotiate away their own power. President Duarte told me that he had met with guerrilla representatives on 17 separate occasions without detecting even a hint on their part that they genuinely desired peace. In Costa Rica, President Arias said that he, too, had met with the Salvadoran guerrilla leaders and found them rigid in their pursuit of a military victory.

For more than 8 years, the guerillas have held firm to a policy of nonparticipation and nonrecognition of elections. During my visit, no one that I talked to expected that policy to change. But on January 24, less than 2 weeks after my return from El Salvador, it did.

On that day, the five guerilla leaders outlined a set of conditions under which they would accept and support the electoral process. The conditions they cited include:

A delay in the Presidential elections from March until September;

An end to repression of political and labor union activity by the Armed Forces;

A commitment by the military to remain in its barracks on election day;

The formation of a broadly representative civilian monitoring council to supervise the elections;

Extension of the right to vote to Salvadorans living abroad; and

A commitment by the United States to remain neutral in the election.

Unfortunately, although the guerilla proposal includes a call for a 5 day truce immediately preceding and following election day, it offers no plan for a permanent ceasefire; nor does it include a meaningful pledge by the armed opposition to halt its own policies of political intimidation—including the assassination of mayors and other municipal officials.

But despite this, the acceptance of the guerilla proposal, even in modified form, would dramatically transform the political landscale in El Salvador. It would set the stage for a wide-open Presidential campaign in which a full spectrum of political viewpoints would be represented. And if the guerilla proposal could be coupled with a cease-fire, and with strong international pressure on all sides to respect the results of the election, El Salvador could become a far different place than the splintered and gloomy society I visited just 2 weeks ago.

For this reason, I hope that the U.S. Government, as well as the Salvadoran, will take the guerrilla proposal seriously. There is much within their plan that needs to be clarified, and there are obvious constitutional problems involved in delaying the elections. Legitimate objections to the proposal can be made, but the opportunity to break the negotiating stalemate of the past is so great that a failure to respond in a way that would truly test the guerillas' willingness to accept the legitimacy of the democratic process could not be excused.

THE POLITICAL PROCESS

Since 1982, El Salvador has held five elections for municipal, legislative and executive positions. Despite the past failure of the left to participate, and some occasional allegations of fraud; these elections remain an impressive accomplishment.

In less than a decade, and in the midst of civil war, El Salvador has developed many of the superficial trappings of a democracy. Political campaigns are vigorously conducted; political rhetoric freely reported; political issues peacefully debated; and election results respected.

During my trip, I spoke with Ruben Zamora, a spokesman for the Democratic Convergence party of the left, and with the two leading Presidential contenders—Alfredo Cristiani of the ARENA party, and Fidel Chavez Mena, of the Christian Democrats.

Zamora told me that, although his party does not expect to win the election, it does hope to develop a national organization that would compete successfuly in future years. His immediate goal is to gather support for a negotiated settlement to the war, in which the Armed Forces of both the government and the opposition would participate.

Zamora said that the decision he and his colleagues had reached to enter a candidate in this year's Presidential election was originally opposed by the guerrilla groups with which he, although not his coalition, is allied. At the time of our meeting, he was not certain what role the guerillas would decide to adopt as the election grew near. The guerrilla's proposal of January 19 would seem to indicate a growing conviction within both the armed and unarmed left that the Democratic Convergence has the potential to do well in the elections, but that it needs more time—and more freedom—if it is to organize effectively.

But if time was on Ruben Zamora's mind, money was on the mind of Fidel Chavez Mena, the nominee of President Duarte's Christian Democratic party. During a meeting held at his business office in San Salvador, Chavez predicted that he would win the election, but made clear his need for U.S. assistance to bring that outcome about. "To be neutral in this election," he said, "is to favor ARENA." He argued that an ARENA victory would lead to greater confrontation between left and right, greater violence within the country, the loss of international support for the democratic process in El Salvador, and possibly the loss of democracy itself.

"In other countries," he said, "one party wins and the process continues. But ARENA was founded at a reaction to that process."

Chavez admitted that his own party's chances had been damaged by allegations of corruption, and stressed his commitment to a new code of ethics and an improved auditing system that would prevent the misuse of government funds. He also promised to build on Duarte's legacy of a more open political climate in El Salvador.

The third ciivilian political leader I met with was Alfredo Cristiani of ARENA. Cristiani is an articulate, U.S.-educated businessman who talks of the need for national unity, economic and judicial reform, and respect for the democratic process.

He seeks to disarm critics by acknowledging concerns about the role of Major D'Aubuisson in founding his party. He says that his party is being "misjudged" because ARENA started as "a one man show." "But ARENA has evolved from a political movement into a political institution," he told me. "Many new faces have become involved. We are now like other parties. We have liberals, moderates and conservatives. Our party is not involved in violence, although our opponents seek to generalize from cases where individual members of the party have been involved in crimes."

Today, what one makes of ARENA is an issue in United States-Salvadoran relations. But if ARENA wins the election, it may rapidly become the issue. ARENA already controls the National Assembly, which, in turn, controls the judicial branch. ARENA mayors now govern the majority of municipalities throughout the country. Control of the Presidency would give them a monopoly on official power.

Although Cristiani says that D'Aubuisson will not have a direct role in his government, he does not distance himself from D'Aubuisson's politics, and especially in rural areas where he is most popular, D'Aubuisson campaigns at Cristiani's side.

An ARENA victory will present new and extremely difficult questions for the United States. Many of those we met with in El Salvador, including those considered to be political moderates, believe that the election of Cristiani will produce greater violence from both the right and the left. They foresee a return to the "dirty war" period of the early 1980's, and predict that nonviolent opposition leaders will once again be forced to choose between exile and resort to the use of arms. President Duarte said simply that "behind the democratic face of ARENA is a structure that is totally fascist."

It seems likely that an ARENA victory would reduce, if not eliminate, the prospects for further progress toward reforming the military, increasing respect for human rights, building a workable judicial system or opening the door of economic opportunity to the poor, who make up the vast majority of the Salvadoran population.

The United States cannot—and the Bush administration assuredly will not—simply walk away from El Salvador if Cristiani wins. But neither could we accept a return to the government-sponsored violence and repression of the past. We must establish—and hold firm—to the principle that U.S. aid comes with a price; and that price is progress toward social and economic justice.

HUMAN RIGHTS AND JUDICIAL REFORM

From 1980 until 1983, the Armed Forces waged a war of repression in which tens of thousands of Salvadoran civilians were killed. Today, the army is more professional. When it uses torture, it does so more carefully, less brutally and more selectively. It kills fewer civilians. And it is less likely to interfere in domestic political affairs.

U.S. officials are quick to praise the Armed Forces for the progress they have made. But this progress falls far short of what is needed to make true democracy possible in El Salvador. The Army can—and does—still kill with impunity when it wishes to do so. It can—and does—still use torture and intimidation to terrorize those suspected of subversive acts. It can—and does—still shield right-wing death squads who defend the economic well-being of El Salvador's small and privileged upper class. And years of war and U.S. aid have made the Armed Forces more powerful than they have ever been.

I disagree with the Salvadoran left on many issues, but Ruben Zamora and his allies have always been correct in asserting that much of the power held in theoretically democratic El Salvador rests not with democratically elected civilians, but with the Armed Forces. The power they have often illegally exercised flows quite literally from the barrel of a gun. The people of El Salvador did not vote for it; it is every bit as illegitimate as any power sought by the guerrillas; and it is every bit as much a threat to democracy as that concept is understood in the United States.

One recent example illustrates this point.

In September, 10 Salvadoran campesinos were murdered by the Armed Forces in the town of San Francisco, in San Vicente province. The military claims the deaths occurred during the course of a guerrilla ambush, despite the evidence that the victims were shot in the head at close range. Army Chief of Staff Colonel Emilio Ponce told me that the guerillas must have dug up the bodies and shot them in the head in order to make it appear to be a massacre. This view was dismissed as ridiculous by those, including an official of the U.S. Embassy, who have seen the bodies and studied the case.

As is typical in such instances, the Salvadoran Government has promised to investigate; the military claims it wants only the truth; the judge assigned to the case has resigned in fear for his life; and the investigation appears to be going nowhere.

This case is but the latest reason why it is not enough for United States officials simply to talk about human rights "progress" in El Salvador.

It is not enough for the State Department to compose multicolored charts that show more civilians were murdered by the government in 1 year than in the next. The issue is whether the armed forces and the right wing retain the power to kill with impunity; the power to determine who should be killed and when and why and for what reason; the power to kill as they have killed before and to know that they will get away with it—that they will not be punished as individuals; and that the armed forces will not be deprived of the U.S. military aid upon which they have come so completely to depend.

All the "progress" notwithstanding, these conditions still exist today in El Salvador. And, as long as they do, those who oppose the policies of the government will live not in a democracy, but on a leash.

For years, Congress and the administration have labored with concerned and courageous Salvadorans to build a workable judicial system. We have given legal and police training, provided law enforcement and forensic equipment, offered to protect judges and virtually begged the military to allow at least one of its officers above the rank of captain to be convicted for a crime committed against civilians. But, we have failed.

Colonel Ponce's macabre explanation of the killings at San Francisco is but the latest example of a pattern in which the military obstructs justice and then claims confusion as to why the judicial system does not work. Right wing leaders do the same thing. ARENA party candidate Cristiani expressed to me his deep sadness about the state of the judicial system in El Salvador. But only a few days before, his party had forced the nation's Attorney General to resign because he had tried to extradite one of D'Aubuisson's cronies from the United States.

It is true that the military has occasionally transferred officers to less sensitive posts; forced some into early retirement; and allowed a handful of junior officers to be punished for killing American nuns. It is also true that the military is now much more likely than before to imprison, rather than execute, those whom it has rounded up for interrogation. But the military has not—and it is plain that it voluntarily will not—require its own officers to submit to a system of justice it cannot wholly control.

In the months ahead, I will be encouraging the Bush administration to make judicial reform and respect for human rights an absolute precondition to continued United States military support for El Salvador. This issue is not, and it has never been, a question of the ability of El Salvador to administer a system of justice. It has always been a question of power. The Armed Forces have the power to see that a workable system of civil justice is created; and they have the power to hold their own personnel accountable for military crimes.

For 8 years, we have insisted that progress on judicial reform would affect our decisions on military aid. For 8 years, the military has called our bluff. The time has come for us to call theirs.

LABOR RIGHTS AND THE ECONOMY

Because my delegation included American labor leaders, a major focus of our visit was the issue of labor rights. Accordingly, we met with Salvadoran labor officials of every conceivable political and vocational stripe in an effort to understand the conflicts that lie behind worker unrest in that country. In so doing, we verified the truth of a comment made to us by one observer who said that "keeping track of changes in the Salvadoran labor movement is like trying to map sand dunes in the middle of a desert storm."

This is because the country's work force is splintered into a bewildering variety of unions, federations, cooperatives and informal units subject to an equally bewildering variety of widely ignored and frequently contradictory laws, regulations and constitutional protections.

Most Salvadorans do not hold full time jobs, and most of those who do are poorly paid. The legal minimum wage ranges from $2 per day for farm workers to $3.60 for industrial workers in San Salvador. Overall, wages have not kept pace with inflation, and the standard of living even for those lucky enough to hold full time jobs has fallen by one-third since 1983. Roughly 40 percent of workers now make up what is euphemistically called the "informal sector" of Salvadoran society, which is a polite way of saying their families lack jobs, decent shelter, health care and adequate schools.

Since the Central American Workers Congress was founded in San Salvador in 1911, labor rights have played a central role in the competition for political and economic power in El Salvador. Throughout the century, periods of organization have been succeeded by periods of vicious repression carried out in behalf of a small agricultural and business elite. Most recently, union activists were among the principal victims of the right wing death squads that terrorized El Salvador during the early years of this decade.

Today, union activity is once again on the rise, in keeping with the general trend toward more open political debate. And once again, unions are at the center of the struggle for political influence and power.

During my visit to El Salvador, I found a labor movement that was generally united about the need for peace; for improved working conditions and increased rights; and fearful of the possible consequences of an ARENA victory in the March elections.

Union leaders were united, as well, in expressing concern about harassment and intimidation of labor activists by the armed forces.

Our delegation heard testimony from both urban and rural workers who had been captured and interrogated for days at a time by military authorities. One young man was repeatedly threatened with execution; held without food or water or sleep for several days; and forced to perform physical exercises past the point of exhaustion. In his case, as in others, the objective was to force the victim to implicate his coworkers in proguerrilla activity.

Union leaders and many others during our visit commented on the propensity of the government to equate labor activism with communism and support for the armed opposition. Such accusations, it is argued, provide the government both with an excuse to ignore just labor demands, and with the means to legitimize acts of repression. "Any struggle to improve the lot of the people is linked to the Communists;" said one union leader, "this has been the history of El Salvador for fifty years."

Despite labor agreement on some issues, deep divisions exist with respect to ideology and tactics.

The leftward leaning UNTS coalition, for example, favors what it calls a "popular struggle", involving militant demonstrations, frequent work actions and the active politicization of the working class. Their avowed goal—which they freely admit and confidently predict—is the collapse of the existing governmental structure. UNTS leaders accuse the rival UNOC federation of putting the interests of the government and the United States above the interests of Salvadoran workers.

UNCO leaders, on the other hand, see themselves as a unifying force within the nation, committed to nonviolence and to traditional western concepts of democracy. They criticize both the left and the right for human rights violations, and go to great lengths to deny allegations that they have been "brought off" either by the Christian Democratic party or by the United States.

Because the labor movement is the largest organized popular force in El Salvador, its leaders are subject to intense pressure by those wishing to manipulate the course of political events inside the country. That category includes guerrilla leaders, civilan politicians, the armed forces, the business sector, and the U.S. Government. As a result, union leaders may find themselves threatened, cajoled, propagandized, befriended, betrayed and, all too often, corrupted. It is an atmosphere that breeds suspicion and obscures the real issues of worker dignity and human rights.

The fact is that all of El Salvador is today poisoned and polarized by accusations not only against labor leaders, but against church officials, students, political leaders and others who argue for change.

During my few short days in El Salvador, I saw a young woman lying paralyzed in a small hut in the countryside, surrounded by a family too poor and too frightened to get her proper—or for that matter, any—medical care. I saw a hospital still damaged by an earthquake that had occurred almost 3 years age, delivering babies and providing surgical care in surroundings less sanitary than the average American living room. I saw whole urban neighborhoods constructed out of tin and cardboard, wedged into ravines where nothing grows except the appetites of young children.

I listened to a young man talk of being kidnapped, threatened with execution, held for days without food and water, and forced to do hard physical exercises for hours at a time—all in an effort to force him to inform on his fellow workers. I saw the photos of young men murdered because someone suspected them of something they were never directly accused of; and I heard a military officer lie about those deaths while expressing gratitude, in the same breath, for U.S. military aid.

It is no wonder that there are strikes in El Salvador. It is no wonder that there are demonstrations. And I have no doubt that some of them—perhaps most—are carried out in cooperation to one degree or another with the guerrillas.

It would be absurd to deny that links exist between the political left and the military left in El Salvador. But there can also be no doubt that those links are strengthened every time an official of our government, or of El Salvador's, uses that reason to deny the existence of the need for change, or to excuse the repression of those peacefully demonstrating for reform.

I believe that the United States should support legitimate and reasonable labor demands in El Salvador, as part of a larger program aimed at improving the social and economic condition of the poor majority of that country.

We should criticize the harassment and intimidation of labor leaders when that occurs; we should support the establishment—and the observance—of a fair labor code; and we should encourage the development of labor unions and federations inside El Salvador that honestly serve the interests of their constituencies, rather than any outside group.

Even more important, we must re-examine the nature and purpose of the assistance we provide to El Salvador. Today, the primary beneficiaries of that aid are the Armed Forces and the civilian leaders of the Government. Both are riddled with corruption; and neither is believed by the poor majority of El Salvador to have the best interests of the country at heart.

El Salvador is the only nation in the world where we contribute more to the national budget than the people of that country do themselves. We owe it to our taxpayers, and we owe it to the people of El Salvador, to see that our aid dollars are used honestly, and that they contribute, as well as they can in time of war, to building a society that is more just, more equal, more humane, and more capable of meeting the basic human needs of its people.

CONCLUSION

I am convinced that the problem with past U.S. policy toward El Salvador has not been its goals. Those goals—democracy, land reform, judicial reform and human rights—are correct.

The problem is that we have not been firm enough or true enough to our goals. We espouse democracy, but we have strengthened a military that only accepts those aspects of democracy which do not threaten its power. We espouse economic reform, but we back off when opposition emerges from the right wing. We espouse judicial reform, but make excuses for those elements in judicial reform, but make excuses for those elements in Salvadoran society that have made judicial reform impossible. We espouse human rights, but we have refused to make the miltiary pay a price for its continued violation of human rights.

As a result, those who hold the greatest power in El Salvador, especially the Armed Forces, have been spared the need to choose between a real commitment to democratic values and losing U.S. aid. Because the conditions we attach to our aid have been diluted; the Salvadoran response has been diluted. Because we have defined their survival in power as our overriding goal, we have lost the leverage required to ensure that that power is legitimately exercised.

Because we have been too easily satisfied; we have obscured the very reasons for our investment in El Salvador.

During my visit, U.S. Embassy officials sought to persuade me, that issues of war, peace and the economy notwithstanding, the important thing was that the elements of a real democracy are being assembled in El Salvador. And its is true that real gains in political freedom have been made.

But ultimately, Salvadorans will judge democracy not by the number of elections that have been held or by the number of speeches that have been given, but by the difference they can see in their own lives. If democracy cannot put food in front of a family; or fair wages in the pocket of a laborer; or a land title in the hands of a campesino; or hope in the heart of a child—then sooner or later, the people will choose another way.

That is why our policy toward El Salvador must begin with the understanding that a political solution to the conflict in that country is essential. A stable democracy cannot be constructed on a mountain of skulls; and a viable economy cannot be built amidst the ruins of civil war. The Untied States must become the foremost proponet for peace in El Salvador.

Second, we should reconsider the level and types of military and economic assistance we provide to El Savador. The development of a functioning civil and military justice system should be an absolute prerequisite to continuing aid at anything close to current levels. We should condition a portion of our assistance on improved respect for labor rights. And we should shift a greater portion of our economic aid to meeting the urgent social needs of the Salvadoran people, whether those priorities are in accord with that of the next government of El Salvador or not.

Third, we ought to actively solicit the advice of other Latin American leaders in designing and carrying out our policy toward El Salvador.

And finally, we must not repeat our earlier mistakes and take refuge in easy answers. The problems of El Salvador will not be solved by one man or by one election or by one agreement. They will not be solved by the United States acting alone. And they will not be solved by ideologues who see every issue in the larger context of East-West relations.

For 8 years, our policy toward El Salvador and toward Central America, as a whole, has been crippled by those who sought to govern not on the basis of facts, but on the basis of ideological preconception.

Today, we have a new President and a new Secretary of State. Let us go forward, with open eyes and open minds, to make a fresh start; to see if the necessary elements for peace and economic reform are in fact present in El Salvador; and to see if we can help the citizens of that country to transform their "history of lies . . . injustice . . frustration . . . (and) misery" into a future of opportunity and hope.

MEMBER'S REQUEST FOR RECOGNITION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] rise?

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution at the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman for that purpose at this time.

Without objection, the Chair will receive 1-minute speeches.

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, at what point in the proceedings today will the Speaker recognize this Member from California for a privileged resolution that is at the desk?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). The gentleman from California will be recognized at the appropriate time. This is not the appropriate time. Unanimous-consent requests for 1-minute speeches are in process at the moment, and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRAFICANT].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, could the Chair indicate what the appropriate time will be?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the time the gentleman seeks recognition the Chair will decide whether it is appropriate or not.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio.

WHAT IS NEXT ON THE CONGRESSIONAL PAY RAISE?

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, Congress could not make the tough budget cuts, so we passed the Gramm-Rudman, and if necessary we will let the guy from OMB do it.

Closing military bases is also very tough. We could not do that, so we created a commission that will do that.

Now, pay raises are awfully touchy. We cannot give ourselves a pay raise, so we create a commission to do it.

What is next, folks? Will there come a day when the neighborhood Crime Watch will have to defend America because Congress does not have the necessary anatomy to face a real crisis?

This is ridiculous. While Congress expects the working men and working women of my district to continue to take wage concessions, we are supposed to get a 51-percent pay hike. That is ridiculous.

The American people cannot be fooled any longer. If all Federal workers got a 4-percent raise, we should get that 4-percent raise. We have let them fly by in the past. I think it is time we stand up.

Today is a good day. I think we should have a vote on this. We should have the decency to vote on the issue, and I would ask for that to be considered.

INTRODUCTION OF THE FREDERICKSBURG AND SPOTSYLVANIA NATIONAL MILITARY PARK EXPANSION ACT

(Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am most fortunate to live in and represent a district that is filled with history. Much of that history involves the Civil War, which was fought throughout most of my district between 1861 and 1865.

It is important that we promote a balanced Federal policy for preserving those lands that are most important to the future understanding of our history.

I am introducing a bill today for such a purpose—to expand the boundaries of the Fredericksburg and Spotsylvania National Military Park near Fredericksburg, VA. This legislation will allow the Park Service to realize its goal of protecting all those lands it considers significant for promoting an understanding of four key Civil War battles—Chancellorsville, Fredericksburg, Spotsylvania Court House and Wilderness.

Specifically, this legislation would add 900 acres in both fee and easements to better enable the park to promote an understanding of the battles that occurred in this region. In addition, this legislation would permit the park to divest itself of roughly 400 acres determined not to be essential toward this end.

It is imperative that the Congress enact this legislation quickly, before the quickening pace of growth in this area eliminates forever the possibility of preserving these important lands.

VOTE NO ON THE CONGRESSIONAL PAY INCREASE

(Mr. ROTH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, in the time allocated to me, I wish to emphasize three points:

First, we in this Congress represent the American people. We represent their wishes, their desires, their hopes, but basically their will.

The people have said no to a congressional pay increase and therefore we of this Congress will say no and vote no to the pay increase.

Second, Thomas Jefferson has written that our system of government can only function when the people have their trust and confidence in it. This pay raise has eroded that trust and confidence. Let us vote it up or down and get this issue behind us so we can go on with the Nation's business.

Third, we want to remind the American people that Congress gets a lot of blame, some deserved, some undeserved; but that they, the people, rule and the lessons that all of us can learn are that when the people are incensed as much about deficits, drugs, waste in spending as they are about this pay increase, that those issues will be resolved, too.

By voting down the pay increase, we again take the high moral ground. We in this Congress have hundreds of groups, hundreds of groups that come into our Capitol Hill offices always asking for more and more. When these special interest groups come now, we can say, "Well, we in Congress didn't take a pay increase."

We have got to resolve the deficit problem, and saying no to all those special interest groups will mean more to us than any pay increase.

WHY SO MUCH TENSION ON THE FLOOR TODAY?

(Mr. TAUKE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, why is it that on a Monday when there is no business scheduled we have a Chamber full of Members? Why is there such tension on the floor of the House today? It is because we have failed to stand up to the plate and take a bat on the pay raise issue.

Mr. Speaker, the problem that we have here is that our process is lousy, first of all, and second, the timing for a 50-percent pay raise in 1989 is terrible.

We should as Members of Congress this year be providing moral leadership to the country on the deficit question.

But how will we be able to do that if we are the first ones at the public trough? The short answer is that we will not be able to.

So how do we get ourselves out of this mess? By changing the process.

First, vote down the pay raise that is before us now.

Second, consider a pay raise under a different scenerio, where we vote on it up or down and it does not take effect until after the next election.

REJECT THE PAY RAISE

(Mr. CALLAHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CALLAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to implore you to bring the activities of the House into the light of public scrutiny by allowing it to vote to accept or reject the 50-percent pay raise proposed by former President Reagan.

I understand that some Members do not desire their positions to be known and I appreciate the sensitivity of this issue. However, I am opposed to this large salary increase when so many beneficiaries of Federal programs must sacrifice and I feel strongly that we have a responsibility to record our positions.

It is simply inconceivable to the American people that a recommendation to raise congressional pay to $135,000 was accompanied by a proposal to eliminate next year's COLA for Federal and military retirees. They view this as extremely unfair and they are right.

The issue of congressional pay has been and will probably always be a political nightmare. This is true regardless of one's position. We are viewed as scoundrels who resort to sneaking pay raises through, while we publicly protest and point our fingers at others. It is convenient but dishonest to avoid the accountability a vote entails. But the American people see through this process. They deserve to know how their Representatives voted because they elected us to make these hard decisions.

Let us show some guts around here and schedule a vote.

PRAISING THE 200TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FIRST CHINESE ARRIVAL IN HAWAII

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, as we celebrate 200 years of Congress, I am proud that this is also the bicentennial of the first arrival of Chinese in Hawaii.

In 1789, they sailed from Kwangtung or Fukien as carpenters and smiths on European trading ships.

King Kamehemeha the Great welcomed these skilled craftsmen, who were followed by Chinese businessmen, technicians, and farmers.

In the mid-19th century, thousands came as contract laborers in our sugar cane fields. They worked hard, but dreamed of leaving the plantations for a better life. And leave they did.

They struggled for equality, and today, Chinese Americans in Hawaii are leaders in business, education, and public service.

I am sure that this year's 200th anniversary celebration will reinforce the universal qualities by which Hawaii's Chinese achieved success; reverence for education, hard work and respect for our elders.

Today is the New Year of the Chinese throughout Hawaii and the world. It is also designated as the Year of the Snake.

My best wishes to the Chinese and all those who join them in this annual celebration.

MEMBERS WANT OPPORTUNITY TO VOTE ON PAY RAISE

(Mr. RAVENEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, House rule 9 reads in vital part, "Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings." Mr. Speaker, by our participation in this shameful pay-raise conspiracy, we have deservedly brought down on this House the disgust of the American people, 99 percent of whom earn less than we. Mr. Speaker, save as hopeful seed what remnant of dignity and integrity we collectively have left by providing us the opportunity to vote on this burning issue. Only you, Mr. Speaker, can save us from ourselves.

HAS THERE BEEN A REVELATION OF LIGHT?

(Mr. DANNEMEYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I want to make very clear what is going on here today. If the processes or rules of the House are followed, we are going to have rollcall vote today. I am not sure whether that rollcall vote will be on a motion to adjourn, whether it will be on a motion to table, or whether it will be on a privileged motion that this Member from California intends to offer. Hopefully it will be found to be privileged. If not, then this Member would seek to, with all respect, appeal the ruling of the Chair on which we would get a rollcall vote on that.

Whether this rollcall vote is on appealing the ruling of the Chair or whether it is on the dilatory mode of moving to adjourn or moving to table, this vote, the rollcall vote today, will be the rollcall vote the public will look to as to whether or not the Members prefer to sustain this aberration in the process that exists today; namely, where by the back door we can finesse our way into adjusting our compensation by a factor of 50 percent. The American people are outraged by this.

Since my Democrat friends along with the Speaker were in Greenbrier this weekend, I would like to ask the Speaker whether he has had a revelation of light not unlike that which came to Saul on the road to Damascus described in Acts 9, verses 4 to 22. If the light has come, maybe Saul, or rather the Speaker, can change back Saul to Paul.

PUBLIC UNDERESTIMATES HYPOCRISY

(Mr. OBEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to get into the substance of the pay raise issue. I have already told my constituents what I will do if it passes.

I do want to take just a moment to note that, lo and behold, it is possible for hypocrisy even to reach its way to the floor of the House. The Speaker of the House has taken a good deal of heat over the last few weeks because he is supposedly refusing to allow a vote to come on this issue.

Yet, one of the gentlemen who spoke within the last 10 minutes, and in that speech indicated his opposition to a pay raise, came to me just 2 weeks ago and said, "For God sake, the Speaker is not going to allow a vote, is he?"

I would simply suggest that if anyone in the public really believes that they will get an honest view of where people are standing on this pay raise issue if there is a vote, they greatly underestimate the hypocrisy of some Members who from time to time have populated this body.

LET US BE REAL REPRESENTATIVES OF THE PEOPLE

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, on the issue of the pay raise, there is plenty of hypocrisy to go around. The whole process that we have before us is hypocriphal. It is hypocriphal for this reason: It has become known in the public as "Vote no and take the dough."

Mr. Speaker, we were sent here to do better than that. The Senate voted on this but they voted up or down, and we ought to have the decency to do the same thing. That is all the gentleman from California is going to ask here today is that we actually vote on the issue, not a phony vote taken a day after the issue.

I cannot believe that anybody who is writing me against the 50-percent pay raise is for a 30-percent pay raise either. We ought not do something that is that kind of hypocrisy. Let us have a vote before the issue, a real vote up or down. Let us tell the American people where we stand on the issue.

I think the House will vote down the pay raise because we understand that in America today where people are going to be asked to make sacrifices of all kinds, we cannot lead the way by taking a huge increase in pay.

I think we will vote it down. But let us have that vote and let us be real representatives of the people.

TAXPAYERS SHOULD NOT HAVE TO SUBSIDIZE MANSION MORTGAGES

(Mr. GIBBONS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, as all of us know, there is a big letter writing campaign promoted by the realtors and the homebuilders on legislation that has not even been proposed concerning the deductibility of home mortgage interest for tax purposes. At this point I am inserting in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial of Sunday, February 5, 1989, of the St. Petersburg Times, written by its distinguished editorialist, Martin Dyckman, entitled "Taxpayers Shouldn't Have To Subsidize Mansion Mortgages."

I hope all of my colleagues will read this very well reasoned article and perhaps they can use it in answering some of their realtors' and homebuilders' mail. I would like to call this article particularly to MARGE ROUKEMA and LES AUCOIN's attention.

TAXPAYERS SHOULDN'T HAVE TO SUBSIDIZE MANSION MORTGAGES

(By Martin Dyckman)

Each week's New York Times Magazine contains several pages of real estate advertising appropriate for inciting revolutions. If "five elegant rooms" overlooking Central Park suit one's fancy, they are $1,295,000. Or perhaps one prefers an "exquisite English" in Westchester County for $1,775,000. A six-bedroom oceanfront mansion with 10 baths and a five-car garage is available at Boca Raton for only $6.5-million. For the thrifty, there is a Longboat Key condominium that boasts of its "towering nine-story atrium with cascading waterfalls and vibrant tropical foliage," where residences with views of both the Gulf of Mexico and Sarasota Bay are priced as low as $425,000.

"Who can afford these?" my wife keeps asking.

"I don't know," I say, "but I'll tell you who helps to pay for them. We do."

And so do you.

The Internal Revenue Code isn't quite as generous as it used to be, but the taxpayer is still allowed to deduct the interest on as much as $1-million in mortgage debt on first and second homes. Assuming that the mortgage interest is 10 percent and the taxpayer is paying the same 28-percent marginal tax rate as most of the middle class, that view of Central Park comes with a public subsidy worth as much as $28,000 a year.

Most Americans don't even earn that much.

The mortgage interest deduction is so popular that no politician wants to get caught sounding as if he or she wants to repeal it. None that I know of does. But it seems that there ought to be a few more of them with the moral courage to draw the lines more fairly. If the original purposes were to encourage and assist ordinary Americans to buy homes, assisting millionaires to buy mansions is a perversion of that intent. Anyone who can afford the upkeep on a Central Park vista has no business asking the taxpayers to help. That's all the more true now that interest on student loans, family cars and other consumer debt has been made nondeductible in order to save money for the government.

The mansion subsidy is as bad for the economy as for the national debt. It's one of the reasons why the Reagan tax cuts did not produce the predicted surge in new industrial capital. Too many of the wealthy would rather invest their tax cuts in splendid homes. As the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) explains it, "The high interest deduction currently allowed, along with the other tax advantages accorded to owner-occupied housing, shifts investment in businesses. This shift contributes to a relatively low rate of personal saving and investment in business assets in the United States compared with other developed countries that do not allow such large mortgage and consumer interest deductions."

As the CBO also points out, billions of dollars in new tax revenue could be squeezed out of the mortgage deduction without causing any pain to most taxpayers. Setting a limit of $12,000 per single return or $20,000 on a joint return would net $3-billion a year by 1993 and a total of $10.3-billion from now to then. Assuming interest of 10 percent, no couple with a mortgage balance under $200,000 would have anything to worry about.

"This option," says the CBO, would affect less than one-half of one percent of taxpayers. It would retain the basic incentive of home ownership but would not subsidize the luxury component of the most expensive homes and vacation homes. Because the caps are higher than the deductions now taken by virtually all taxpayers, they would cause a minimum of disruption to home prices and home building."

Another option suggested by the CBO could pick up $14.5-billion a year by 1993, and $55.6-billion between now and then, by limiting the deduction to 15 percent of interest paid, which is the value to taxpayers in the lowest bracket. Don't expect Congress ever to think seriously about that one, since it would affect about half the taxpayers. A third option, high in symbolic value but negligible in projected revenue at only $600-million a year, is to phase out the deduction for second homes.

Congress isn't showing any sign of wanting to consider even the easy option, however, and with members of a new Republican administration scouring the exorbitant real estate markets of Georgetown, McLean and Potomac, President Bush isn't likely to be proposing it.

Nonetheless, the real estate and mortgage industries are waging a public scare campaign that aims to make sure the thought never even crosses congressional minds. But they're not telling the public any of the reasons why it should.

With the 1988 interest statement, for example, our mortgage company took pains to warn us that "Congress is considering limiting the amount of interest you may deduct on your federal income tax return in order to raise tax revenues . . .

"If you are concerned about new restrictions or lower limits, please contact your U.S. senators and representatives to express your opposition to any more tampering with the mortgage interest deduction."

I suspect the president of BancBoston Mortgage Corporation might have something to lose by a $20,000 mortgage interest deduction limit, but we surely don't, and neither do 99.9 percent of the rest of America. We all would have something to gain, as a matter of fact, from removing a little more of that mountainous national debt America's children are about to inherit.

This week, as it happens, Bush is expected to ask Congress for more tax cuts for the rich, supposedly to stimulate investment. Sure. The day he gets them, just watch the price tags on those luxury homes go up.

AT LEAST FIVE THINGS ARE WRONG WITH PROPOSED PAY RAISE

(Mr. NIELSON of Utah asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, there are at least five things wrong with this pay raise. We all know what they are.

First, it sets the wrong example when we are trying to reduce the budget deficit; second, 50 percent is way out of line with the 2 percent we are offering civil service workers and 4 percent for Social Security recipients; third, it is a cowardly way to attach it to the judiciary and executives to use it as a lever to get our raise; fourth, we do it without a vote in a very cowardly way.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we should wait 2 years before any pay raise, and we had one 2 years ago which itself was controversial. We should wait until a congressional election intervenes.

Mr. Speaker, I have a letter addressed to the Speaker which I will insert in the RECORD. Also received in my office was a petition along with 7,000 signatures expressing indignation over the refusal to allow Members to vote on the salary increase.

The letter follows:

PROVO, UT,
February 3, 1989.

Mr. JIM WRIGHT,
Speaker, House of Representatives, c/o Representative Howard Nielson, and Utah Congressional Delegation.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER. There was a time when members of the largest legislative body of the United States was presided over by an individual whose personal and professional interest was devoted solely to the best interests of the constituents he served. During his years as Speaker of the House, he worked closely with his colleagues to assure the American people had a voice in their own affairs. This individual will be long remembered as a true statesman, one whose voice will long echo through the chambers in which he sat. His name—Sam Rayburn, not long ago your predecessor.

There was also a time, when a congressman from the state of New York, was banished from the House of Representatives, partly because he had misused his office in the pursuit of financial gain. He will long be remembered as a politician who put the interests of the people who had elected him behind him, and sought to use his office for sordid and unstatesmanlike purposes. His name—Adam Clayton Powell. This expulsion occurred at a time when Congress still had an internal code of ethics, which was enforced from within, and which evoked the confidence of the American people.

In the years since Rayburn and Powell, the integrity of government has become tainted as a result of Watergate, Iran-Contra, the scandals of the Reagan years, and so on. Somewhere in the midst of these episodes and others similar to them, the voice of Sam Rayburn has become muted, as has the confidence of the American People. Behavior which brought about the expulsion of Representative Powell has now become commonplace, as leaders of the House of Representatives perpetuate a pay raise at a time and under circumstances that would make Speaker Rayburn turn over in his grave and which would make Representative Powell appear to be a candidate for sainthood.

At a time when a drug epidemic gnaws at the very fiber of society, at a time when massive deficits seek to threaten the well being of my four year old boy (possibly even throughout his adulthood), at a time when the rapidly growing aged population is being stripped of their dignity and independence because they cannot afford decent housing or health care—you, the Speaker of the House and many of your associates, are seeking to fill your pockets and pension accounts at the cost of the public. The cost is financial and one of confidence. You have supported this payraise of yours at a time when so many like myself, struggling with a young family are scared at what the next four years may bring unless this deficit is curbed, and unless other priorities are addressed. In case you have forgotten, when folks in the private sector want a pay raise, they must meet certain expectations.

Mr. Speaker, we the American people expect you to place your own interests aside, place aside partisan strategy, remember who sent you to Washington, and on what premise. Many of us are hurting, the vast majority of us are fast losing confidence in our Government, simply because our pocketbooks and our respect for you has been robbed in much the same way a cunning thief absconds with all that is dear to one who is defenseless.

If your priorities and your allegiance is not to the challenges of bringing America back on course, in a united and a lasting manner, then my only wish for you would be to follow the same course that befalls those who do not perform the level of expectation alluded to. In the real world, non performers are dismissed or forced to resign. You have obviously pulled the wool over the eyes of those in your Congressional District, but when the vast majority of polls taken in recent weeks speak loudly that you have chosen to ignore the wishes of the public, then I do believe measures ought to be taken to remove you from your position as Speaker, and to have you banished, as was Representative Powell.

In those footsteps do you wish to walk Mr. Speaker—Rayburn or Powell? As your actions have spoken louder than your smooth rhetoric, I am asking my Congressional Delegation to take measures to have you formally censured on the Floor of the House, to have this pay raise declined retroactive, at least until the deficits have been resolved and until dramatic progress has been made in toward combating the drug problem. You have dealt a severe blow to the integrity of that office you hold, for you have not even had the courage to bring this issue to a vote. It is obvious that a statesman no longer presides over the U.S. House of Representatives—it is presided over by a greedy politician, who represents his own interests rather than the voters.

I cannot help but think that President Reagan may have had an ulterior motive of his own when he approved this pay raise. Throughout his administration, he placed the blame for the deficits on the shoulders of Congress, the appropriating body of government. He made many statements to the effect that Congress is not interested in curbing the deficit. I do believe the former President has called your bluff. All at our expense.

Get the job done first Jim Wright, then let's talk about a raise. If you aren't committed to the people who put you where you are, then get the hell out of Washington and let's get some more persons like Howard Nielson who truly care about their people. All the people. We, the people.

Or has the government of the people, by the people and for the people become the government of the deficits, of the pay raise and of the pensions?

Respectfully,

MICHAEL L. BENEDICT.

TRIBUTE TO BRENT JACOBSON

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, this Nation has just inaugurated its 41st President and, fast on his heels, we are the bicentennial Congress. The attention of the Nation is—and should be—focused on these events. Indeed they are high points of our public life.

Yet, I would like to ask that we pause for a moment to consider another, less publicized event: the contribution of one heroic man, Brent Jacobson, originally from Utah, but residing in Idaho.

On Thursday, January 12, Brent Jacobson, an employee of the U.S. Forest Service, made the ultimate contribution to the public welfare and safety.

The suspects of a violent burglary near Sandpoint, ID, had escaped into the nearby forest, leaving fear in the hearts of the townspeople. A manhunt was organized using local sheriff's deputies and the FBI, but no one seemed to know the forest well enough to track the suspects.

That was where Brent Jacobson came in. As a fire control and law enforcement officer of the U.S. Forest Service, he knew the terrain better than most, and volunteered to lead the manhunt.

The suspects were finally apprehended, but only after Brent gave the ultimate contribution: his life.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that we consider the heroism that was involved here. Brent Jacobson knew the danger that such a manhunt posed, yet he still volunteered to lead it. His family should be proud because his contribution to justice and the public good will not soon be forgotten.

CONGRESSIONAL INDIFFERENCE TO WILL OF THE PEOPLE

(Mr. COBLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COBLE. Mr. Speaker, indifference at times is more offensive than open and notorious antagonism. This body, the people's House, if you will, is guilty of indifference and ignoring the universal plea of the American people in calling for a vote on the proposed salary increase issue.

This House is turning a deaf ear. This House is turning a blind eye to Americans by our indifference. Americans are begging us to record our vote on this delicate issue. Is this asking too much?

We wonder in amazement why the American citizenry has little respect for the U.S. Congress.

VOTE ON THE PAY RAISE

(Mr. KOLBE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, today is our last opportunity. The American people know the charade that is being played out here this week in the House of Representatives. Either we vote today, the last session before the 50-percent pay increase goes into effect, or we will be faced with explaining this pay increase to those we represent, the Aemrican people.

Everyone in the House knows what those people think. We were sworn in January 3 and there has been ample opportunity for us to have a vote on this issue. Let us not miss this last opportunity.

Good arguments can be made for a pay increase, but no good argument can be made for the way we are doing it here. It is more than just the millions of dollars involved in paying our salaries. It is the psychological effect this pay increase will have on our ability to hold the line on taxes and spending, to look our constituents in the eye and tell them there will be no increase in the programs that affect them.

Today, Mr. Speaker, let us begin a new chapter of honesty and integrity for the House. Let us stand up and be counted on the subject of a pay increase for ourselves.

AFGHANISTAN

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, a dramatic change in the course of history is taking place, and no, I am not talking about this horrible 51-percent pay increase. I am talking about the fact that we have in the past 9 years witnessed a horrible war in south Asia with the Communist invasion of Afghanistan which began on December 27, 1979.

We have gotten reports that this war is coming to an end and, in fact, the last of the Soviets troops are about to withdraw. We have to be very vigilant as we look at that issue, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of concerns which we must address.

First, there are still some 20 million landmines on ground in Afghanistan and the world's largest population of refugees is preparing to enter from Pakistan and Iran. We must work to insure that those landmines are removed.

We must also do everything that we possibly can to insure that the alliance sticks together. Having sacrified for 9 years we have to do what we can to keep them together, Mr. Speaker, now that we have seen that the government of Najibullah is illegitimate, as it is a success as we see this government about to fall.

WHO IS TO BLAME FOR PAY RAISE PREDICAMENT?

(Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I think what we have witnessed in the last several days is a conspicuous example of "who" is right rather than "what" is right. I doubt seriously that anyone in this body would ask me to take a back seat on the question of opposing excessive compensation for Members of Congress. I am as outraged as others about this proposed pay raise.

I served when I was 18 years old in infantry combat and received a 10-percent disability from it. My pay in the Marine Corps was, in today's dollars, $6,000 per year. And I would rather serve in this congressional job at that salary than in that job at the present salary, speaking of comparative worth.

However, the capacity for the American public to be outraged by this is exceeded only by the permissiveness of the American public in its attitude toward the person who proposed this pay raise in Congress: Ronald Wilson Reagan, who in his 8 years in the White House tripled the expense to the American taxpayers of operating the White House, and who upon leaving the White House accepted a personal gift from people who may have been affected by his decisions in office of $2 million.

I am outraged, not by "who" but by "what", and I predict that in this case the tradition in the House will prevail. That tradition is "vote no and take the dough," even in the form of contributions to charities which Members would not have to make from their own salaries, but instead either from the pay raise or money to them from lobbyists in the form of so-called honoria.

PAY RAISE VOTE

(Mr. GOSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I am dismayed and disappointed that we have not met the issue of our pay raise head on. We are supposed to be the House of the people—we are supposed to be responsive to the views of our constituents. Most of my colleagues have constituents like the people in southwest Florida who are saying "we don't approve of this pay raise and we sure don't like the way you're doing it." I agree with my constituents.

As a freshman I have inherited a system that allows us to give ourselves more money without having to say we want more money. It's a system that makes us completely unaccountable. It's a system that is wrong. It's a system that erodes the credibility of this House. And it's a system that should be changed.

Well, we have the opportunity today to change that system. There is still time for us to vote on the pay raise—before it goes into effect. We owe it to the American people to let them know where we stand. We owe it to ourselves and to this institution to record a vote—not a symbolic vote, but a vote that counts. I would like to record my vote on the pay raise as "no."

MEMBERS SHOULD VOTE ON PAY RAISE

(Mr. GUNDERSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what our level of pay ought to be, and I am one of those Members who does not even think we should vote on it. I think it is a conflict of interest.

But I have to tell my colleagues I think there is something very wrong in a 50-percent raise at one time, and I think there is something very, very wrong in a process that has us here on Monday because we have decided we are not going to have a session on Tuesday and Wednesday. And there is something very, very, very wrong in a process that suggests that a vote on Thursday to lower the raise to 30 percent is somehow credible with the American people.

Our level of pay may be open to proper public debate. But the process that we are under this week will destroy any credibility of this Congress in the eyes of the American people before we get on to deal with the real, serious issues that this Nation faces.

CONGRESS MUST DEAL UP FRONT WITH PAY RAISE

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, one of the previous speakers this morning talked about our past President, Ronald Reagan, and somehow indicated that he was to blame for the situation we find ourselves in. It is true that the commission recommended a 50-percent increase. It is true that the previous President proposed that to Congress. But that is where it is.

It is in our lap now. It is our duty to deal with it, and there is absolutely no question in my mind, nor is there any question in the mind of any Member of this House that we should vote on it.

I would urge the Members of this House to allow a vote, the Speaker to allow a vote so that we can go on record whether we are for that increase or against it.

I would second the comments of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TAUKE] this morning when he indicated that what we should do is to change the law so that no pay raise goes into effect until after the next congressional election. That is what James Madison proposed 200 years ago. That is what 25 States have endorsed and ratified as a constitutional amendment, and I think that is what we should do.

Let us have a vote, Mr. Speaker, and let us vote on this pay raise.

OPPOSITION TO PAY RAISE

(Mr. HUGHES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the motion to adjourn, and intend to vote against adjournment.

I am taking this position as a means of making clear my opposition to a 50-percent pay increase, and to encourage the leadership to make sure that a pay raise does not take effect without a vote of this body.

While I understand that salaries must remain competitive in order to attract qualified people to government service, I believe that any pay raise should be reasonable. A 50-percent pay increase is not reasonable. Moreover, it comes at the wrong time and sends the wrong signal to the American public. With a Federal budget deficit in excess of $140 billion, Congress should be providing leadership in reducing Federal spending and getting our fiscal house in order.

As difficult as it may be, Congess must come to grips with the salary increase issue in a straightforward fashion. We must recognize that following a procedure which allows the raise to effect by default will simply be viewed by the American people as cowardly.

I am hopeful that our leadership, which has struggled long and hard to do the right thing on this issue, will recognize that a vote against adjournment reflects the sentiment of this body on the pay raise and will, accordingly, schedule an up-or-down vote on the issue.

CONGRESSIONAL PAY RAISE

(Mr. MILLER of Washington asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, on the subject of the congressional pay raise, we have seen in this body an effort to avoid a vote, and then we saw an effort to have a secret vote. Now we see an effort to conduct a contrived vote after the fact.

□ 1230

Mr. Speaker, I believe we should take an up or down vote on this issue, face up to it. This is a representative body of the world's leading democracy and we should start acting like it.

LET US VOTE ON SENATE RESOLUTION 7

(Mr. HERGER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HERGER. Mr. Speaker, when I was in northern California meeting with my constituents this past weekend they made it loud and clear to me that they demand the Congress to vote on the pay raise and that they expect that vote to be a resounding "no."

I agree with their sentiments wholeheartedly. In a few minutes we will have an opportunity to decide whether or not to act on the Senate Resolution 7, legislation passed in the Senate last week to repeal the pay raise. I believe we should consider this resolution because it will be the only genuine opportunity we have to block the raise.

Let us remember that we are representatives of the people and let us do what they are demanding; let us block the pay raise today.

WE HAVE 25,000 POSITIONS UNFILLED BECAUSE WE CAN'T COMPETE WITH RESEARCH COLLEGES

(Mr. FORD of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it has been said somewhat unkindly of the U.S. Congress that it is the greatest collection of super egos found in any body in the world and that arises out of the fact that so frequently the Members, some Members, talk as if the entire universe revolved around the importance of their incumbency in office.

As chairman of the committee with responsibility for the entire Federal work force, it sickens me, frankly, Mr. Speaker, to hear all of these egotistical chest beaters on both sides getting up here talking about how they want to vote to give their pay away and not one thought about the fact that we do not have people to carry out our promise to do research on AIDS; we do not have people to finish the project of getting the Space Program back on track; we do not have people who should be there doing research on cancer; we do not have them because we have 25,000 positions that require a master's degree or a graduate degree that sit unfilled because we cannot compete with even the smallest research colleges for that kind of personnel.

Now I do not hear anybody saying "While I am bravely asking my constituencies to annoint me for being willing to put on a crown of thorns and either turn down or give back my pay, I have no thought at all about the fact that the promises we make to fight drugs, to do research into the killing illnesses of this country is languishing over there because we do not have the courage to put the resources where our politics has been mouthed."

MEMBERS SHOULD SET EXAMPLE FOR TRUST, NOT SELF-INDULGENCE

(Mr. MILLER of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MILLER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to join my colleagues in opposition to the proposed congressional pay raise. How can we in good conscience permit a 51-percent increase to go forward at this time. We are supposed to set the example for trust and good judgment not be the example for self-indulgence and poor taste.

As one who has sponsored and cosponsored a series of measures aimed at changing the automatic manner in which this raise is supposed to take place, I call upon the leadership to permit this matter to come to a vote before the salary increase goes into effect on Wednesday.

REQUEST TO OFFER PRIVILEGED MOTION

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution at the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). The gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] is recognized.

The gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] will allow the 1-minute speeches to be requested, as is the normal order of the House.

CONGRESS LACKS THE COURAGE TO DEAL WITH A TRULY NATIONAL DILEMMA

(Mr. FAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, if I were to permit myself some anger out of frustration I guess I would focus on my colleagues who come into the well today to get whole with the folks back home, to let them know in clear and uncertain terms that they did not want this pay raise. But I am not angry and frustrated as much as saddened by the lack of self-respect that pervades this institution because as we sit here we all know that deep in our hearts if there were a way for it to happen without our being accomplices we would take that 50- or that 30-percent increase in pay and apply it to those college educations for our kids or to take care of the other needs that we as individuals have with our families.

It is not as important, frankly, as the raise was to the executive and judicial branches. You know, the average executive manager in Reagan's administration served for 2 years, did not even have time to understand the job before he or she left. The judges who have been appointed under this Reagan administration are soon going to have their children in school and they are going to be leaving and making vacancies for others.

This is not a partisan or ideological problem. It is a lack of courage that exists in this Congress to deal with a truly national dilemma. And if we are not willing to get on top of it somehow in a bipartisan manner in the next 2 years, this will fester and once more pervade and perhaps ruin another session of Congress.

HONORARIA AND THE GRANDFATHER CLAUSE SHOULD BE DEALT WITH

(Mr. CLEMENT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CLEMENT. Mr. Speaker, I have been here 1 year. I love the U.S. House of Representatives. It is a great institution. It means a lot to all of us.

I am not for a 51-percent raise, do not expect one in 1 year's period of time. But I also know that the package is a little bit larger than just increasing pay for Members of Congress.

What about the honoraria? You know and I know there have been many abuses of the honoraria. I am not proud of it. I do not think any of us should be.

What about the grandfather clause, about Members of Congress who can put campaign funds and convert them to private use? That has truly been abused.

We have seen Senator Tower, now being talked about as Secretary of Defense, put $1 million in his pocket because of this particular provision.

We saw St Germain in the last 30 days of his election cancel half of his campaign budget, put that money into this pocket.

Let us look at the total picture rather than part of the picture. I do not expect a 51-percent raise. I do think we should have a recorded vote. But there is a bigger question in everyone's minds concerning this issue. I think we should look at all issues, not just what Members of Congress ought to be compensated for, because the cost of living is very high in Washington, DC.

IT IS HYPOCRISY TO TALK AGAINST THE PAY RAISE AND TAKE IT

(Mrs. BOXER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, there is an expression, my friends, that goes something like "certain issues separate the men from the boys, the women from the girls." And this is one of those issues.

And I feel very proud that I am a person who has stood up before my constituency and I said "I can't set my own pay. It is a conflict of interest." I did it when I was on the local board of supervisors. It was untenable and uncomfortable.

So when I came into office I said, "Let a commission, separate and apart from this institution, people picked from the private sector, not involved, set my pay."

I think that is a sensible position. We do not know whether the commission is going to increase our salaries, decrease it, or suggest we do away with honoraria.

I think it is the only position that makes sense. And I just want to go on record as saying this: For those of my friends in this Congress—and I will work with you on many important issues, much more important than this, and I look forward to that—for those of you who get up here and demagog this issue and whip it to death and think that you are going to be Mr. Popular or Ms. Popular in your district, I am going to watch who you are and I am going to tell your constituents if you take that pay raise, whether it is 10 percent, 20 percent or 30 percent; because to talk against the pay raise and then keep it would be hypocritical and unbecoming a Member of Congress.

I WILL TELL MY PEOPLE A MEMBER OF CONGRESS SHOULD BE WORTH $135,000

(Mr. DINGELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, for a number of days I have listened to remarks in this body and elsewhere which speak ill of the makers of those remarks. This issue did not originate here. It is not an attempt to steal by Members of the House. This issue was sent up by President Reagan, and has been endorsed by President Bush.

What does it do? It raises the salaries of judges, Cabinet officers, and high Government executives and salaries of Members of Congress.

I happen to think this is a very precious and important body; I love it and I respect it. If it is not worth the figures that are fixed in the President's submission in the budget then the taxpayers are being shortchanged.

I intend to go home and tell my people that a Member of Congress should be worth $135,000 and that is an issue that is worth fighting out.

Some of the millionaires and others around here who would rather say this is in some way a raid on the Treasury or an impropriety should go home and justify whether they are worth that money or that they do not like the process. Then we should be ready to watch at the Sergeant at Arms' window to see who collects the $135,000 that they say they are not worth.

I am going to be watching. I hope the press will be watching my colleagues who will be making such pious statements.

The other body, composed largely of millionaires, has spoken and says they are not worth it. I have to say I am not prepared to quarrel with that judgment. I will be interested to see how many of my colleagues over here arrive at the same judgment, and I am sure those of you who feel you are not worth that, I will not quarrel with your judgment either.

REQUEST FOR ADJOURNMENT FROM MONDAY, FEBRUARY 6, 1989, TO THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1989

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 a.m. on Thursday, February 9, 1989.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the request of the gentleman from California.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. COELHO].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 88, nays 238, not voting 106, as follows:

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR TOMORROW

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOLEY). The Chair recognizes the distinguished Speaker of the House.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to acknowledge the will of the House which always is supreme in the U.S. House of Representatives. It should be and will be. It is apparent to me, and I think to all of us, that a majority of the Members desire to have a vote up or down on the simple question of whether to approve the recommendation of the Quadrennial Pay Commission. We shall have that vote in the House tomorrow. That vote will be up or down. Members will have that opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, let me take this occasion to thank all the Members on both sides for the advice they have given in good faith to the leadership on both sides, for their willingness to give us their counsel, and for their helpful suggestions.

This is always a very difficult matter. Nobody ever wants to vote to raise his own pay, particularly those of us who depend upon the public for their approval of the rectitude of our actions, and particularly at a time such as this when budgetary stringencies make it enormously difficult for us to finance programs which are of great worth and great value to a great many American citizens. I think we must surely understand one another and be tolerant of one another's positions and one another's opinions.

Mr. Speaker, I have been committed generally to the proposition that was enshrined in the law wherein some 12 years ago the Congress voted in the presumption that it was adopting a reform, that the judgment ought to be taken out of the hands of the Members of Congress since hardly anybody else in society is expected to vote on his or her own pay. So much for that reform. I think the Members clearly believe that the public expects them and us individually and collectively to make that judgment.

There may be some further conversations as to how we should try to make fair these opportunities to make these judgments in the future years. It might be worth observing on this occasion that the reasons the Commission found that executive pay and pay of an equivalency of Members of Congress had lagged behind other pay with respect to the cost of living since 1969, is because the Congress repeatedly has excluded itself, has voted, voted up front, to exclude itself and others in our category from the cost-of-living pay raises which we have voted for other people in society—retirees, military and civilian, and employees of the Federal Government. For whatever worth that is, I think Members of Congress should be willing to recognize that that is one of the fundamental reasons which was cited by those who prepared the recommendation of the Quadrennial Commission.

Now the majority has spoken, and the majority will speak even more emphatically tomorrow in keeping with the traditions of this institution, the very best traditions of this institution. The majority will rule.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 7 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, February 7, 1989, at 12 noon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

THE DAYTON-HUDSON JOBPLUS PROGRAM

HON. TIMOTHY J. PENNY
OF MINNESOTA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, I rise today to inform the body of "JobPlus," an innovative job training program established by the Dayton-Hudson Department Store Co. to recruit and place teen mothers at risk of long-term welfare dependency.

A few days ago, Marcia Townley, of Dayton-Hudson, testified before a Senate committee about the tremendous success of the JobPlus Program.

Mr. Speaker, the Dayton-Hudson Corp. is a truly model employer and corporate citizen. I can only hope that Dayton's fine efforts, once disseminated, will be duplicated by other firms.

I insert a copy of Ms. Townley's remarks in the RECORD:

THE DAYTON-HUDSON JOBPLUS PROGRAM

Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee. My name is Marcia Townley, I am Director of Public Affairs for Dayton-Hudson Department Store Company, a division of Dayton Hudson Corporation. Dayton Hudson Corporation is made up of four retail divisions. Dayton Hudson Department Store Company, Target, Mervyn's and Lechmere, with 627 stores in 37 states. (Dayton Hudson Corporation is the nation's 26th largest employer with approximately 120,000 employees). The department store division for which I work has 37 Dayton's and Hudson's stores in 7 states. Most of its stores are in Minnesota and Michigan.

I am here today to tell you about an exciting program which Dayton Hudson Department Store Company created four years ago with a three year new initiative grant from the Dayton Hudson Foundation. The program tests a job partnership concept to recruit and place teen mothers at risk of long term welfare dependency in entry level jobs.

The exciting news is that after four years of experience with JobPlus the program works!

JobPlus is a public/private partnership between an employer with jobs and a willingness to hire 'perceived at risk' employees, and a human service agency with expertise in working with clients at risk of long term welfare dependency.

JobPlus works for five basic reasons. The first two reasons have to do with attitude—the last three have to do with unique components of the program.

First the partners, Dayton's, and the Minneapolis YWCA, the human service agency that does the recruitment and provides job readiness training—believe that the participants in the program will make valuable and competent employees. As an employer we've expanded our views of who are eligible employees. We've moved beyond what had been our traditional work force. We no longer can rely on walk in applicants from the ranks of college students and home makers to meet our employee needs.

Second, we believe that given the opportunity for a real job and support in overcoming barriers to employment, these young women want to work. But it must be a rational choice. The benefits from work must outweigh the benefits of remaining on welfare.

Now the three unique program components that help guarantee success.

First, the non-profit agency provides a two week job readiness program. Included is a two day retreat at a wilderness camp where the participants experience "Outward Bound" type challenges and team building exercises.

Second, when each participant begins her job, she is assigned a peer partner, someone in the company in a similar job who knows the ropes and will serve as a friend and mentor. This was the component about which I was most concerned. Would our employees be willing to make that extra effort? Well, it turned out to be one of the most successful aspects of the program. Peer partners received as much satisfaction as they gave.

The third unique component has to do with follow-up. The non-profit agency staff does not abandon the employee after the first day on the job. Instead, agency staff keeps in close touch with both the participant and the employer to anticipate and respond to issues before they become problems that might interfere with job performance.

Human resource departments and supervisors do not have the time nor the experience to help employees with a day care or housing crisis, a parenting problem or other personal issues that could impact job success. These are areas where the human service agency's expertise is invaluable. Many times an employee might have become discouraged, quit or been fired, if it had not been for the advocacy and problem solving of the non-profit agency staff.

This is truly a win/win partnership, with all three partners—the agency, the employer and the employee—contributing what each does best and receiving in return rewards or benefits.

The non-profit agency works with the future employee to remove barriers to employment—something neither the employer or the employee could accomplish alone—and once the participant is employed continues to work with employer and employee to help guarantee success on the job. In return the agency experiences the satisfaction of contributing to the successful employment of the participant and receives funding, in this case from the Dayton Hudson Foundation for the first three years and not from the State of Minnesota, to pay for staff expenses.

The employer provides a job, a peer partner and good supervision; in return the employer gains a valued, competent employee.

The program participants make a commitment to employment and life changes in return for support from the human service agency, and a job from the employer.

Now—how do we know JobPlus works?

During the first two years of the program we contracted with an outside consultant to evaluate the results of the first 100 participants. Less formal follow-up since then with all participants confirms the continued success of the program.

Success is measured from two perspectives—from that of the employer and from that of the program participants.

It is extremely important that the program be viewed as a success from a business point of view—and it is: 75% of the participants receive satisfactory or good job performance ratings on standard job performance measures; job retention is as good or better than control groups of regular employees hired for similar jobs.

Good performance and good retention are measures that would guarantee success to any employer.

From the participant's point of view, success is determined by evaluating individual progress in four areas. The areas are: Continued employment, education progress, reduced dependence on public assistance, no unplanned pregnancies.

If progress is made in 3-4 of those areas the participants are viewed as successful or very successful. 65% were successful or very successful after 6-8 months in the program. The good news is that in a 16 monthly follow-up, 63% were still evaluated as successful.

In preparation for this testimony we did a quick follow up of the 160 young women we had hired since summer 1985. Of the 160, we were able to reach 93 or 58% of the total. We are thrilled with the results. Remember some of these women began the program almost four years ago: 88% (82) of those we reached were successful or very successful on the four measures described earlier; 90% (84) had no unplanned pregnancy. The self esteem support has worked; 70% (65) are still working—18% at Dayton's (12); 17% (16) are in school; 12% (11) are unemployed.

Even if we assumed that all we didn't reach were unsuccessful, the program would have a 51% success rate.

Finally, one must ask what have we learned from our experience with JobPlus that could help other employers hire less traditional employees or public policy makers grapple with issues of moving individuals off the welfare roles onto the work roles?

First—we need to create the right attitude. We must believe that given the chance and the resources, these individuals want to work. And trust that given the appropriate support and supervision, they will make valuable employees.

Second—the transition from welfare dependence to economic self sufficiency does not happen over night. It occurs over a period of time and by taking many—sometimes small steps—in the right direction.

Don't expect the first job to be the ultimate career fit or lifetime occupation. Remember it is a first job—any maybe it is best, considering child rearing responsibilities, that it be a part-time job. Just make it the best first job you can.

So often I hear stories of AFDC moms with two small kids and no real work history of taking a full time job or a full course load at a technical institute and failing because a housing crisis, or even a sick child, has made them miss too much work or too much school to continue. After a set back like that, it is hard to start again. Maybe she would have made it, if it had been a part time job or a ½ course load.

Remember it's progress we want, not overnight miracles. What we want are people moving up this job ladder for entry level positions on. The purpose of JobPlus is to help individuals take those first steps.

Third—because we want progress and cannot expect overnight miracles, it is important for transitional support to be there. Day care or subsidized care should continue during the first six months to a year on a job. Medicaid should continue until the employee is eligible for company benefits. Funds should be available for case worker follow up during the first months on the job to help solve the unexpected, but predictable, crisis. The provision of these transitional services and support should be the role of the public sector and appears to be the direction of welfare reform experiments and legislation.

But finally—success comes down to self-esteem. All the daycare, health benefits and training money can buy will not make a difference if the participant does not believe in herself. That is why we need case workers who are sensitive to the needs and aspirations of their clients and not bogged down in paper work, follow-up and tangible support to handle the transitional issues during the early months on the job and job supervision that is fair, caring and expectant of positive results. Each person must be treated as a special individual with unique needs and talents. Given that kind of support and encouragement, changes of success are great.

We know from experience it can be done. We've done it and we're doing it again. We're now expanding JobPlus to Flint, Michigan through the YWCA, and to metro Detroit through Michigan Human Services. We know other employers and human service agencies can do it, too. To help with replication of JobPlus, we have a manual and video tape to assist others develop and shape a JobPlus program to their own environment. We are eager to share these materials with the committee and others who are interested.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before the committee and would be happy to respond to questions.

A TRIBUTE TO HAL JACKSON

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to honor today Harold B. "Hal" Jackson, a man who has devoted 50 years entertaining America's radio audiences. Mr. Jackson is group chairman of Inner City Broadcasting Corp., and has a long history of "firsts" that opened doors to other aspiring black broadcasters and recording artists. He was the first black radio announcer in network radio, the first black M.C. of a network jazz show, the first host of an interracial network jazz show and the first host of an interracial network television presentation.

In 1971, Hal joined with a group of other black businessmen and women headed by Percy E. Sutton, to acquire the first radio station to be owned and operated by blacks, WLIB–AM, New York. He broadened the acquisition through the subsequent purchase of WBLS–FM, the flagship station for Inner City Broadcasting, where he made the station No. 1 in the Nation.

Born in Charleston, SC, Hal grew up in Washington, DC, where he attended Howard University and launched his broadcasting career. He announced the play-by-play home games for Howard and other schools and the American Negro Baseball League over station WOOK. Several years later his voice could be heard on three different stations daily. He hosted nightly news interview programs and sports shows in Washington, Baltimore, and Annapolis. He later moved into television where he hosted a variety program from the Howard Theater.

After commuting to New York for several years, Hal decided to move to the Big Apple. He became the only New York City radio personality to broadcast three daily shows on three different stations in the same day. Four million listeners tuned in nightly to hear his interviews with jazz and show biz greats and to enjoy the music he selected to be played.

He has received countless civic and community awards including three from Presidents of the United States. He is universally loved by young and old, black and white. For the last 14 years, through his production of the Miss U.S. Teen Pageant, Hal has given young minority women, 13 to 16 the opportunity to show their performing talents on national television. They have won scholarships and other prizes and most important get encouragement for their career track.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to honor a man whose career and lifestyle can be summarized by the theme he chose for his radio programs: "It is nice to be important, but it is more important to be nice."

U.S. NUCLEAR WEAPONS PLANTS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 18, 1989 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

U.S. NUCLEAR WEAPONS PLANTS

A major new expense requiring the attention of the President and the Congress will be the cost of cleaning up and modernizing America's aging nuclear weapons complex. The Department of Energy (DOE) runs seventeen plants and laboratories to manufacture nuclear weapons for our armed forces. Yet after almost forty years of neglect and deferred action, they are in a state of serious decline. Presently all government nuclear reactors are out of service due to safety problems, and cases of contamination and hazardous pollution have been found at every processing facility in the complex. The General Accounting Office (GAO), the congressional agency which audits the government, estimates that it will cost $100.130 billion to clean up the facilities over the next twenty years, and another $15–25 billion to build new reactors and relocate aging processing facilities.

The cleanup of our nuclear weapons facilities poses a serious challenge to lawmakers, by requiring a balancing act between public safety and national security concerns. A tug-of-war is shaping up between those who want to ensure that the system is safe and environmentally sound, and those who insist that our nuclear deterrent cannot wait on absolute safety. Both sides can make strong cases for their claims. Environmentalists point to the contamination at the Fernald, Ohio, uranium processing plant—a plant employing many Hoosiers—as clear proof of the need for stronger environmental oversight. Defense advocates counter that continued shutdown of the Savannah River nuclear reactors in South Carolina could undermine our ability to arm our nuclear weapons with tritium, an essential component of modern thermonuclear bombs.

The causes of the rapid decline of the system are wide-ranging. First, many of the facilities in the production complex were built in the 1940s and 1950s at the beginning of the nuclear era. The old age of the Savannah River reactors may account for the cracking recently found in the cooling systems, and may threaten the reactor vessels themselves. Second, the government's nuclear weapons industry was born and built in the secrecy of the Cold War era, when safety and environmental concerns took a back seat to national security. Consequently, DOE's record on safety over the years has not kept pace with practices and procedures at civilian facilities. DOE has often failed to impose rigorous standards for operation and maintenance personnel, and its facilities have had a poor record of compliance with federal environmental laws. For example, DOE, officials recently admitted they knowingly allowed the Fernald plant to release thousands of tons of radioactive uranium waste into the environment. DOE has also indicated that its plutonium processing plant in Rocky Flats, Colorado, has been leaking hazardous chemicals into underground water wells north of Denver and contaminating soil with plutonium dust. Finally, the Congress must also bear some of the responsibility for the current state of the nuclear weapons industry. In past years it failed to provide rigorous oversight of the weapons production system, in part because Energy and Defense Department officials were not entirely candid about the extent of the problem, and in part because the Congress did not want to face the high price tag for cleanup and modernization.

In coming months the Congress and the Administration will face some tough decisions on how to deal with the problems at our nuclear weapons plants. First, policymakers must decide how much federal money should be spent on cleaning up and rebuilding our nuclear weapons production, and determine where the funds will come from in an era of ever-tighter federal budgets. A recent DOE report to the Congress estimated that it would cost $48–85 billion to clean up existing DOE facilities over the next twenty years, and the President's budget for 1990 proposed spending $18 billion over the next five years for cleanup and moderization programs. Critics argue that these figures tend to underestimate the problem.

Another pressing problem involves how we will proceed with cleaning up and rebuilding the system while not undermining our national security needs. This debate will focus on present and future supplies of tritium, the perishable and essential radioactive gas which must be replenished periodically in nuclear warheads. The Energy Department's reactors at Savannah River for producing tritium all are shut down for safety reasons. Officials at the Department of Defense argue that the plants must be restarted by the summer, or else the country's nuclear deterrent will be jeopardized. Critics respond that the tritium stockpile will last for another two years, and perhaps longer if supplies are recycled from obsolete weapons in our nuclear stockpile. They argue that it would make more sense to ensure that the Savannah River reactors are completely safe before DOE restarts them. Other options—such as buying tritium from foreign countries or converting civilian reactors to tritium production—have political and legal drawbacks.

A third set of problems will involve improving the overall environmental and safety performance at the weapons facilities so that past failures are not repeated. There are indications that the Congress will consider legislation this year that would greatly expand regulation of the nuclear weapons complex, including proposals to tighten and enforce environmental and safety standards throughout the system.

The problem at our nuclear weapons plants is a classic example of conflict between two worthy policy goals—maintaining our national security and preserving safe environment. In the past we have let our national security concerns dominate, and have hedged on public safety concerns. That one-sided approach has not worked, and has only compounded the problem. Whatever the ultimate solution, the urgency of the crisis in the weapons industry will require both branches of government to bite the bullet on the high price tag, and pay the cost of cleaning up and rebuilding our nuclear weapons complex.

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to pay tribute to the inauguration of the Lorenzo Patino Hall of Justice. It is indeed an honor to salute the men and women behind the creation of the hall and the man for which it is so aptly named.

Lorenzo Patino was a man of tremendous courage and character. Born in Mexico, Lorenzo and his parents moved to Sacramento in 1955. He attended California State University, Sacramento and graduated in 1970. Lorenzo then received his juris doctorate from the University of California at Davis and began to practice criminal and personal injury law.

Lorenzo constantly distinguished himself in the field of law. After 6 years, Lorenzo was appointed to the Sacramento Municipal Court. Judge Patino was a member of the board of governors, its first Mexican-American member and was selected in 1981 as Judge of the year by the board. In addition, he was appointed by President Jimmy Carter to the National Institute of Justice Board and was an appointee to the U.S. Attorney General's Advisory Committee for Hispanic Affairs. Lorenzo was also active in the Sacramento Planning Commission, the National Associations for Mental Health, the Legal Aid Society of Sacramento as well as serving as the founding dean of the University of Northern California School of Law.

Sadly for the city of Sacramento and the entire State of California, Loren passed away in 1983, the victim of leukemia at age 35. However, on this day, we remember Lorenzo Patino. In a most fitting gesture, the new Sacramento County Jail will be named the Lorenzo E. Patino Hall of Justice. Given his dedication to the law, his devotion to the service of the public good, and his constant striving for justice, this is indeed a most deserved honor.

In closing, I would like to offer my congratulations as well as my personal thanks to all those who worked so hard to make this day a reality. Each of you is to be heartily commended for your efforts on behalf of the city of Sacramento. I regret that due to business in Washington, I am unable to deliver this address in person. However, it is my sincere hope that you will accept my very best wishes and my congratulations on all your successes.

PEGGY GOODWIN, "LIBRARIAN OF THE YEAR"

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, Peggy Price Goodwin, of Garland, TX, was recently named "Librarian of the Year" by the nationally respected Library Journal.

Miss Goodwin, adult services librarian of Garland, TX Walnut Creek Branch Library, was recognized for her determination to provide materials, services, and programs tailored to the multiethnic needs of her community.

It is crucial that we, as citizens of such a diverse nation, work to bridge cultural and language gaps. Ms. Goodwin's efforts to bridge these gaps, as well as her commitment to education and literacy are commendable and most worthy of recognition.

I would, therefore, like to share with my colleagues, the following article about "Librarian of the Year," Peggy Goodwin, which recently appeared in the Garland Daily News.

[From the Garland (TX) Daily News, Jan. 3, 1989]

GOODWIN BESTOWED WITH TOP HONORS

(By Sue Watkins)

Named Librarian of the Year by nationally respected Library Journal, Peggy Goodwin goes quietly about her work as adult services librarian at Walnut Creek Branch Library.

"I was just flabbergasted," Ms. Goodwin said about the call from John Berry, editor of Library Journal, who advised her she was the publication's first winner and will appear on the magazine's January cover. "That's something that happens to other people, not to me," she said.

Nevertheless, the publication will honor Ms. Goodwin Friday at a reception at Petito's Restaurant in Washington, DC. On hand to see her receive honors and a $1,500 cash award will be her daughter, Angela Goodwin and Nicholson Library Director Lowell Lindsey.

Goodwin has served the Nicholson Library staff since 1974 when she left part-time work at the Farmers Branch Library to become young-adult librarian. The next year she was named branch head at Walnut Creek, a post she filled for four years. She then was transferred to the main library as humanities librarian, and returned one year ago to Walnut Creek as adult-services librarian.

Co-worker Elaine Klobe, a librarian at the main branch, nominated Ms. Goodwin for the award.

The dedicated personal efforts of Adult Services Librarian Peggy Goodwin are transforming a small branch library into a center where new Americans can feel comfortable learning English and adapting to the United States," writes Ms. Klobe in her nomination letter.

"The Walnut Creek Branch of Nicholson Memorial Library is located in a neighborhood that is 27 percent Hispanic, Asian and other non-English speaking minorities," the letter continues. "Many of these people were not using the library. To assess community need, Goodwin personally conducted on-site door-to-door canvassing of residents. She discovered that the percentage of persons in the neighborhood speaking a language other than English at home had increased 100 percent since 1980."

With the backing and encouragement of the branch head, Liza Arredondo, Goodwin became determined to provide materials, services and programs tailored to the multiethnic needs. Under her leadership, Walnut Creek Library is pioneering a program to meet the community need for an easily accessible multicultural center focusing on English as a second language.

Ms. Goodwin distributed about 500 surveys through stores in the library neighborhood. Responses identified 10 languages—Spanish, Chinese, Korean, Davi, Arabic, Punjabi, Hindi, Vietnamese, Urdu and Romanian—actively used in the survey area, indicating the need to provide the opportunity to learn English. Public schools reach the school-age children, but the parents are not receiving help with language, the library concluded.

As Klobe continues in her nomination of Ms. Goodwin, "Despite a depressed Texas economy and a reduced city budget, Goodwin was undeterred in her mission . . . she devoted untold hours of personal time at home preparing grant applications.

One grant that materialized was for $24,044 from Texas State Library dispersing federal funds. The grant makes possible shelving, videotapes, cassettes, books for beginning readers, staff training and community programs like "Citizenship: What to Expect" and "Communicating across Cultures."

Goodwin was born in Whitewright and reared in Royse City and Dallas, and is a Garland High School graduate. A member of Dallas County, Texas and American Library Associations, she also is a member of Calvary Baptist Church in Garland. She is married to Joe Goodwin, who owns and operates a local welding shop. In addition to 26-year-old daughter Angela, the Goodwins also have a son, 31-year-old Gary.

Klobe's nomination concludes, "Goodwin's vision in reaching out to a multi-ethnic population is a bold effort to meet the special informational and cultural needs of new Americans, while still providing a full range of traditional library services to all patrons. Pointing the way toward excellence, Peggy Goodwin is a role model, a librarian who has made a profound difference in her community."

"This really has involved the whole library system in working for the grant and ordering material," Goodwin said.

RESOLUTION CALLING ON WORLD BANK AND U.S. BANK REGULATORS TO ENCOURAGE BANKS TO REDUCE

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution calling on the World Bank and U.S. bank regulators to encourage banks to reduce the debt service burden of debtor nations in exchange for steps taken by debtor nations to protect tropical rain forests and other natural resources.

Many developing countries have been experiencing severe austerity measures, and general recessionary conditions in their domestic economies. The problem has been particularly acute in Latin America where many countries must service their high foreign debt. As these severe economic conditions persist, sharp declines in per capita incomes and increased unemployment have resulted in more people being forced back into subsistence agriculture, where they draw heavily on and degrade the natural resources base.

Moreover, as the governments of developing countries impose austerity measures insisted upon by the banks, the inevitable result has been a reduction in both staff and expenditure of fledgling, weak environmental agencies, undermining even the minimal efforts made to bring ecological considerations into development planning.

Last year we all experienced "global warming" which scientists believe was partly due to destruction of forests in Latin America. Less that 5 percent of the tropical forests in South America receive any protection. As the worsening economic conditions and mounting debt pressures in developing countries persist, planners are forced out of necessity to ignore environmental planning and conservation when planning both industrial and rural development projects.

Clearly, reforms are needed at the international level to deal simultaneously with the economic and ecological aspects of the problems of developing countries in ways that allow the world economy to stimulate the growth of these countries while giving greater weight to environmental concerns. After all, it is in the interest of banks that the environmental resources of developing countries are not degraded to the point where natural resources become depleted and economically worthless.

The resolution I am introducing merely calls on the World Bank and various U.S. bank regulators to "encourage" banks under their jurisdiction to enter into agreements with nations that have outstanding debt obligations under which the debtor nation agrees to protect tropical rain forests and other natural resources, and in exchange, the bank would agree to reduce the debt servicing burden of the debtor nation through forgiveness of principal, reduction in interest rates, deferral of payments, or lengthening of the loan term.

In my view, when banks relieve the debt burden on debtor nations, a reasonable swap would be the protection of the tropical rain forests and other natural resources which all life depends on to survive.

For the benefit of others, I have requested that the resolution be printed at this point of my statement:

H. CON. RES. 44

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring),

Whereas the planet Earth has finite resources and a fragile atmosphere;

Whereas the global warming trend is exacerbated by the destruction of forests in Latin America;

Whereas less than 5 percent of the world's tropical forests receive any protection;

Whereas austerity measures and general recessionary conditions have brought sharp declines in per capita incomes and have increased unemployment in developing countries resulting in more people being forced back into subsistence agriculture, where they draw heavily on and degrade the natural resources base;

Whereas government austerity programs in developing countries inevitably include reductions in both the staff and expenditure of fledgling, weak environmental agencies, undermining even the minimal efforts made to bring ecological considerations into development planning;

Whereas worsening economic conditions and mounting debt pressures in developing countries result in planners ignoring environmental planning and conservation in both industrial and rural development projects; and

Whereas reforms at the international level are needed to deal simultaneously with the economic and ecological aspects of the problems of developing countries in ways that allow the world economy to stimulate the growth of such countries while giving greater weight to environmental concerns: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development should, and the Comptroller of the Currency, the Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation should each take all appropriate steps to encourage each bank under their respective jurisdictions to, enter into agreements with nations that have outstanding debt obligations to such bank under which the debtor nation would agree to protect tropical rain forests and other natural resources in the nation from destruction or depletion, and in exchange, the bank would agree to reduce the debt servicing burden of the debtor nation through forgiveness of principal, reduction in interest rates, deferral of payments, or lengthening of the loan term.

CPSC—HOPE FOR THE FUTURE?

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, for the past 8 years, the Consumer Product Safety Commission has suffered as a result of serious budget and personnel cuts and, recently, by a leadership seemingly opposed to its basic mission of protecting consumers from unsafe products. But a new administration and the resignation of the previous Chairman offer hope for the future. What follows is an article from the February 2 issue of the Washington Post describing some of the difficulties of the Commission:

THE LITTLE AGENCY THAT CAN'T

(By Dale Russakoff)

For eight years, the Consumer Product Safety Commission was Washington's domestic Nicaragua. Nobody declared war on the agency assigned to protect Americans from unsafe products; they just threw everything they had at it.

First they strafed its staff. There were about 975 employees in 1981; today there are 519. Then they imposed economic sanctions. In 1981, it had a budget of $42 million; today it has $34.5 million, almost exactly the price of running the Defense Department for one hour.

Then came the puppet government—a commission stacked with political conservatives who had no background in product safety.

They even took the agency's downtown building away. Today the commissioners, who used to meet in the K Street business district, hold court on the lower floors of a drab, Bethesda apartment building, overlooking a Giant Food loading dock and a bowling alley. (Actually, they don't hold court at all these days because the five-member commission has so many vacancies that it now lacks a quorum of three.)

It is not just consumer lobbies who think things have gotten out of hand. The American Academy of Pediatrics, which sees its share of childhood injuries, says the CPSC "has been emasculated." Bob Adler, associate professor at the University of North Carolina business school, calls it "a regulatory speck."

And a conservative appointed by former president Ronald Reagan said: "This whole place has been traumatized, tortured and drop-kicked around since 1981."

Here is what happens when an agency attempts to protect everyone in America from dangerous products with only $34 million a year:

The health and science staff discovered indoor air pollution threats from humidifiers and wanted to notify the public. It was decided that acting commission chairman Anne Graham would make a videotape for television stations across the country. But there wasn't enough money to rent a studio.

So Ken Giles, a public affairs officer, volunteered his home as the backdrop, and Graham drove there (in her own car) on Monday for the taping. The film required some deft editing, however, because one of Giles' young sons, who was upstairs at the time, began crying just as Graham was saying, "Obviously it's a risk to everyone who's inside. . . ."

It is not uncommon to find one person doing the work of two. Shelley Deppa, a psychologist with nine years' experience examining the safety of children's products, said she recently budgeted how many months it would take to accomplish the work she is assigned this year. She would need 24 months.

In an office jammed with crib headboards, defective rattles and commendations from the commissioners, she explained that she was supposed to finish a study by 1984 on children's headentrapment. But, in between, she was diverted to investigate deaths and injuries from lawn darts, bunk beds, choking hazards, portable electric heaters, crib toys and more.

Its field staff slashed, the Washington staff has become its own roving inspection force, bringing in defective products to be investigated wherever it finds them. Graham brought in a prescription drug that didn't have a child-proof cap. Depps spotted some toys that violated the CPSC choking standard in a craft shop. (She was on her honeymoon at the time.)

In the public affairs office, which has the key task of mailing out bulletins and brochures warning of safety hazards, the printing budget was cut about 50 percent in the last year, office director David Shiflett said. To try to keep pace, the office has shifted envelope-stuffing contracts to the D.C. Association of Retarded Citizens, which charges a cut rate.

Graham, 39, has been acting chairman since the departure last month of Terrence Scanlon, who was known to the agency's supporters as the enemy within. She has been meeting with employees in all divisions, sending out memos hailing Americans' right to know that products are safe and "looking for things I can do to let people know I really believe in our mission."

Graham, a Republican activist and protege of Reagan intimate Lyn Nofiziger, came to the commission in 1986 with no experience in consumer products. But she has won respect as a consumer voice and is being widely greeted as a "new breeze" in these uncertain times. Many employees at her embattled agency said they are hopeful that President Bush's nominee to replace Scanlon will provide Graham with an ally who believes in their work.

But they are understandably reluctant to get too optimistic, and, in any case, the White House appears preoccupied with bigger agencies.

"Whenever a new commissioner was named, we need to say, This one couldn't be worse than the last one.'" a longtime staffer said recently. "Since 1981, we've been afraid to say that."

TRIBUTE TO DR. MARGARET WALKER ALEXANDER

HON. MIKE ESPY

OF MISSISSIPPI

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, the publication of Dr. Margaret Walker Alexander's "Richard Wright: Genius" is a cause for celebration. I feel confident that this book will live up to our every expectation of the full measure of Dr. Alexander's insight into this important Mississippi writer.

Richard Wright is very important to Mississippi and especially to the Second Congressional District which I represent. He was born in Natchez, MS, and lived there until he was 19 years old. His rise to international acclaim as a writer in Chicago, New York, and in Paris and all over the world reflected his strong Mississippi roots.

Richard Wright and his rich legacy are more than ample illustration of the human potential that more often than not is trampled under the weight of poverty, illiteracy, racism and other social ills.

For this reason, I fought hard for a Federal commission to address the social and economic development of the Mississippi River region, including the Mississippi Delta, which gave Richard Wright his start and much of the grist for his creative genius.

Dr. Alexander is to be congratulated on writing an already much heralded book. Her books "Jubilee" and "For My People" have gained her an international reputation as a talented and serious writer.

Her career as a published writer spans more than 50 years since her work first appeared in Crisis magazine in 1934. She has written five books of poetry, several nonfiction books, and of course, "Jubilee."

She received her early education in Methodist Church schools in the South and Gilbert Academy of New Orleans University. She was graduated from Northwestern University with a B.A. degree. In 1940, Dr. Alexander received her master's degree and in 1965 her Ph.D. in English, both from the University of Iowa.

In 1954 she was a Ford Fellow at Yale University. She has appeared on the lecture platform reading her poetry and participating in symposia, seminars, and literary festivals throughout the Nation.

As professor of English at Jackson State University, she founded the Institute for the Study of History, Life, and Culture of Black People and served as director from its inception in 1968 to her retirement in 1979. She also initiated the first program in humanities at the university and taught among other courses, "The Bible as Literature" and creative writing. She currently serves as professor emerita of English.

A widow, Margaret Walker was married for 37 years to the late Mr. Firnist James Alexander, Sr. She has four children and is the proud grandmother of eight.

During the past 20 years, she has been the recipient of six honorary degrees and has received innumerable other awards, citations, and certificates of honor, including the Living Legacy Award from President Jimmy Carter and a proclamation for Margaret Walker Alexander Day from Mississippi Gov. William Winter. She holds a Commemorative Plaque from the Jackson City Council and Mayor Russell Davis, and Guynes Street was renamed Margaret Walker Alexander Drive in her honor. Her works appear in countless anthologies and textbooks throughout the international literary world.

I want to wish Dr. Alexander every success in her continuing endeavors. In closing, I would like to enter into the record a brief excerpt from her book, "Richard Wright: Daemonic Genius."

Going back in my memory to that Sunday afternoon in February 1936, when I saw Wright for the first time, I remember that I went to the meeting because I heard it announced that Langston Hughes would be there * * * I tried to press my manuscripts on Langston, but when I admitted I had no copies he would not take them. Instead, he turned to Wright, who was standing nearby, listening to the conversation and smiling at my desperation. Langston said, "If you people really get a group together, don't forget to include this girl." Wright promised that he would remember.

MEDICAID COMMUNITY AND FACILITY HABILITATION AMENDMENTS OF 1989

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with Mr. FLORIO, Mr. DINGELL, Mr. COELHO, and several other colleagues on the Energy and Commerce Committee in introducing the Medicaid Community and Facility Habilitation Amendments of 1989.

This important legislation would eliminate the institutional bias of the Medicaid Program in paying for services on behalf of low-income individuals with mental retardation or related conditions. By giving States the option of using Federal Medicaid funds to purchase services for this population in the community, the bill would level the financial playing field so that clients and parents will have a choice of community or institutional placement. The bill will also assure the quality of Medicaid-funded services in both community and institutional settings.

On September 30, 1988, the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment held a hearing on two different legislative approaches to improving the Medicaid Program for individuals with mental retardation. I had sponsored one bill, H.R. 5234; Mr. FLORIO had introduced the other, H.R. 3454. We heard from clients, parents, workers, private providers, State officials, and the Congressional Budget Office. Over the past few months, after consulting with all interested parties, Mr. FLORIO, Mr. DINGELL, and I, have worked out a compromise approach to reform in this area. The bill we are introducing today is that compromise. It is a proposal for incremental change that does not go as far as some would like. However, it is fiscally and politically realistic, and I intend to work closely with Mr. FLORIO and Chairman DINGELL to secure its enactment this year.

Under current law, States have the option of using Federal Medicaid funds to pay for medical and health-related services provided to low-income individuals with mental retardation or related conditions—cerebral palsy, epilepsy, and so forth—in intermediate care facilities for the mentally retarded [ICF's/MR], which range in size from small public or private residences of under 15 beds to State-run institutions over 1,000 beds. With one exception, States do not have the option of using Federal Medicaid funds to pay for services to this population in a community setting. That exception—the "2176" home and community-based services waiver—allows States to use

Federal Medicaid funds to cover habilitation, case management, and other services for this population in the community; however, the States must demonstrate that the waivers will be budget-neutral.

The current benefit structure of the Medicaid Program has led to an institutional bias in spending. According to the Congressional Research Service, total Federal and State Medicaid spending on all covered services in fiscal year 1986 was $41 billion; of this amount, $5.1 billion, or 12.4 percent, was spent on ICF/MR services. Total "2176" waiver expenditures for that year on behalf of individuals with mental retardation or related conditions were $220.7 million, or one-half of 1 percent of total Medicaid spending. That same year, State-only, non-Medicaid spending for these individuals was $2.8 billion; much of this amount was spent on community services.

The bill I am introducing today would allow States, at their option, to expand their Medicaid programs to include coverage of "community habilitation and supportive services" to individuals with mental retardation or related conditions. States would not have to demonstrate budget-neutrality, but the services would be subject to minimum Federal quality requirements. The bill would not change current eligibility policy; thus, individuals with mental retardation or related conditions who live in the community and meet the Medicaid income and resource eligibility standards would be eligible for this new benefit if the State chooses to offer it. Individuals would not have to demonstrate that they are at risk for institutional placement in order to qualify for coverage.

The second major thrust of the bill is quality. It would assure the quality of Medicaid-funded services to this population in both community and institutional settings, so as to promote the independence, productivity, and integration into the community of individuals with mental retardation or related conditions. In the case of community services, the bill would direct the establishment of rigorous requirements for provider participation, as well as procedures for monitoring and enforcing compliance with those requirements. I am particularly concerned that Federal Medicaid dollars not pay for substandard community care of the kind described by John Hurst in his three investigative reports in the Los Angeles Times last month. With respect to institutional services, the bill would revise and strengthen the requirements for participation that currently apply to ICF's/MR, as well as the procedures for monitoring and enforcing compliance with those requirements.

According to preliminary, unofficial estimates by the staff of the Congressional Budget Office, the bill would result in coverage of about 20,000 individuals with mental retardation or related conditions in the community. It would increase Federal Medicaid outlays by approximately $100 million per year. That is less than three tenths of 1 percent of the $38 billion that CBO projects the Federal Government will spend on Medicaid in fiscal year 1990.

I want to emphasize what this bill would not do. It would not impose any limitation or cap on Federal Medicaid payments for services provided to individuals with mental retardation or related conditions in ICF's/MR, large or small. The bill would not restrict the rights that Medicaid beneficiaries have under current law to freedom of choice of provider, whether in a community or institutional setting. The bill would not require the States to develop and implement a 5-year plan to transfer individuals from large institutions to community-based settings. Finally, the bill would not prohibit the Secretary of HHS from promulgating or enforcing quality standards for Medicaid-funded services, whether in the community or in an institution.

This is a modest, incremental initiative that both Democrats and Republicans can and should support. What follows is a brief, title-by-title summary:

BRIEF SUMMARY OF FLORIO-WAXMAN-DINGELL MEDICAID COMMUNITY AND FACILITY HABILITATION AMENDMENTS OF 1989 (2/6/89)

OPTIONAL EXPANSION OF COMMUNITY-BASED SERVICES (TITLE I)

Allows States, at their option, to cover under their Medicaid programs "community habilitation and supportive services" for individuals with mental retardation or related conditions. Unlike the current home and community-based services waiver, this option would not require the States to demonstrate budget neutrality or limit participation to those at risk of institutional care. Directs the Secretary of Health and Human Services [HHS] to develop interim and final quality requirements for such services, and establishes a monitoring and enforcement process to ensure compliance with these requirements. Effective the later of January 1, 1990, or 30 days after publication of interim requirements.

QUALITY ASSURANCE FOR HABILITATION FACILITY SERVICES (TITLE II)

The requirements for participation in the Medicaid program currently applicable to intermediate care facilities for the mentally retarded (ICFs/MR, which the bill would rename "habilitation facilities") would be strengthed, and the current monitoring and enforcement procedures would be revised. Effective January 1, 1991.

APPROPRIATE PLACEMENT FOR INDIVIDUALS WITH MENTAL RETARDATION AND RELATED CONDITIONS (TITLE III)

Requires States to implement a preadmission screening program and an annual client review program to assure that all individuals with mental retardation or related conditions who are admitted to, or reside in, a habilitation facility need the level of services provided by such a facility. Effective January 1, 1991.

PAYMENT FOR COMMUNITY AND FACILITY SERVICES (TITLE IV)

Requires States to assure that payment rates for (1) community habilitation or supportive services and (2) habilitation facility services are reasonable and adequate to meet the costs of providing services, on an efficient and economical basis, in conformity with applicable State and Federal laws, regulations, and quality and safety standards.

EMPLOYEE PROTECTIONS AND MISCELLANEOUS (TITLE V)

Requires States to make fair and equitable arrangements for the protection of employees of habilitation facilities that are subject to closure or reduction, including the establishment of paid retraining programs for employment of the affected staff in the delivery of community services. Effective on enactment.

NATIONAL BLACK NURSES DAY

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Congressional Black Caucus and a member of the Congress whose attention has increasingly been drawn to the health care problems of minorities and the poor, I wish to applaud black health care practitioners and proclaim Friday, February 3, 1989 as National Black Nurses Day. Blacks have long been active in the nursing field. Currently, they comprise 5 percent of the total nursing population and practice in all of the varied areas of nursing—clinical, education, administrative, research, Government, and private enterprise. Black nurses past and present can be credited in great part for establishing an environment of quality, service and skill which all of us have come to expect from health care practitioners. They have made significant contributions to the nursing profession and they are an integral part of the health care delivery system. Since February is the month that we have set-aside to honor the contributions made by black Americans to this country, it is fitting that black nurses be recognized and honored for their outstanding contributions to our community and our country.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE FEDERAL BUDGET

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 4, 1989, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE FEDERAL BUDGET

A major task facing the Bush Administration will be to reduce the federal budget deficit. That will have to be done if we are to ensure continued economic growth and cut American dependence on foreign capital. Yet meaningful deficit reduction will be difficult to achieve.

The federal budget has been cut more than is generally acknowledged. Just about every area of domestic spending has been cut below what would have been needed to maintain current services. Even social security was reduced in 1983. Medicare, civil service, and military retirement have also been reduced. The subsidized housing programs which grew very quickly in the 1970s have been put on hold, revenue sharing has been abolished, public sector job programs have been virtually eliminated, and public works grants are being phased out. State and local governments have seen a sharp reduction in the number of federal grants. Even with all of these cutbacks, the federal deficit is about $150 billion a year.

If current law and policy are followed, the federal budget next year will be about $1.15 trillion. Of this, about $300 billion will be for defense, $250 billion for social security, and $150 billion for interests on the national debt. The budget generally reflects the broad priorities of the American people: the most popular federal programs, social security and defense, are by far the most expensive. Less popular programs, like foreign aid, make up only a very small fraction of the budget. That means that the programs that could yield the most savings are precisely those least likely to be cut. If defense, social security, and interests on the debt (which must be paid) are exempted, the Congress and the President must find enough savings from the remaining $450 billion to wipe out the projected $150 billion deficit over the next few years.

That will not be easy to do. That $450 billion includes many important social programs. 30% of it goes for health care, mainly medicare for older persons and the disabled, and medicaid for the poor. Medicare payments have been subject to sharp reductions from current service levels in recent years. Most policymakers, including President-elect Bush, propose increases for medicaid spending. 20% of the $450 billion consists of programs for poor people like food stamps, welfare, housing subsidies, and unemployment compensation. Cuts have already been made in programs for the poor, and significant new reductions are unlikely. Another 10% of the $450 billion goes to civil service and military retirees. These retirement programs have been tightened in recent years and payments cannot be quickly reduced. That leaves about $180 billion for things like veterans benefits, student aid, scientific research, farm supports, aid to education, highway grants, air traffic control, and the space program. Cuts can of course be made in each of these areas but there is not a lot to be squeezed from them. Moreover, cutting some of these programs—like education, science, and road and bridge repair—could weaken our nation's long-term economic competitiveness.

To make matters worse, a long list of budget additions has now become urgent. The federal government insures the deposits in savings and loan institutions. The estimate for closing hundreds of these bankrupt insitutions may run close to $100 billion over a period of years. The nuclear weapons plants must be brought into compliance with safety and environmental protection rules. That will cost another $100 billion, perhaps even more. The air traffic control system needs to be modernized, with cost estimates now running some $25 billion by the year 2000. No one seriously argues today that we should not address unsafe financial institutions, unsafe nuclear reactors, and unsafe air transportation systems.

I would also suggest that the nation must turn more attention to the poor. Of every ten people living in poverty today, four are children. In recent years the disparity between the rich and the poor his widened. The poor today have a smaller share of this country's income than they did in 1980 and the rich have become a lot richer.

Many of the programs for the poor are only partially implemented. Medicaid now reaches only 40% of the poor and 50% of poor children, and should be expanded. So should housing subsidies for the poor. Many other areas are being called to Congress's attention, including child care, early childhood education, and long-term care for the elderly. Another need is for job training programs to help the poor learn the skills needed to support themselves. It is difficult to see how the federal government can afford major new undertakings in any of these areas until we have a better fiscal base. Although social programs can undoubtedly be cut, some areas like health care and housing will almost certainly be expanded.

Balancing the budget without a tax increase and without cutting either defense or social security becomes an enormously difficult, perhaps impossible task. In my view money can still be squeezed out of medicare, and farm supports are higher than they ought to be. Modest across-the-board cuts in most departments of government are manageable. Some programs could be delayed, while others, such as the Small Business Administration and the Economic Development Administration, could be abolished or consolidated into other programs.

The federal budget ultimately expresses the values and the opportunities for the nation. All of us want an economic policy capable of supporting a rising standard of living, and we are uncomfortable with the present emphasis on consumption and massive borrowing. One national interest is certainly to consume less and invest more and to keep the U.S. fully competitive in the world markets. Another national interest is to assure that this nation can continue its political leadership in the world, a leadership which has eroded because of our growing dependence on foreign loans. Other national interests are to maintain our military strength and to maintain important federal programs like social security and health care. Reducing the deficit and balancing these national interests will require some tough policy choices in the months ahead.

OFFICER ROCKY STEVENS—DALLAS POLICE OFFICER OF THE MONTH

HON. JOHN BRYANT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. BRYANT. Mr. Speaker, our local law enforcement agencies and their dedicated employees are our first line of defense against crime. It is always a great pleasure for me, as a member of the House Committee on the Judiciary and its Criminal Justice Subcommittee, as well as a Dallas resident, to join in paying tribute to some of our best local law enforcement officers.

Dallas Police Officer Rocky J. Stevens has been recognized as January Officer of the Month, and I take pride in calling his achievements, described in the Dallas Police News, to the attention of my colleagues and fellow citizens.

[From the Dallas Police News, Jan. 6, 1989]

ROCKY STEVENS SELECTED OFFICER OF THE MONTH

Officer Rocky J. Stevens has been selected by the Dallas Community Police Awards Committee as the January Officer of the Month. He will be honored Jan. 24 with a luncheon in the Garden Room at the Crescent Hotel.

A 13-year employee with the City of Dallas, Officer Stevens has been a member of the Police Department since consolidation of the Park Police on Oct. 1, 1986. As an 11-year veteran with the Park Police, Officer Stevens held the rank of sergeant for six years and the rank of lieutenant for a year and a half.

Currently assigned to the 330 sector on the second watch at Southeast Division, Officer Stevens recently served as Assistant Squad Leader prior to corporal promotions.

His supervisor, Sgt. D.R. Beane, said, "Stevens' experience in management was invaluable. Along with coordinating sector activities in my absence. Officer Stevens kept meticulous records on crime patterns and calls for service locations. He kept me up-to-date on this information along with the names and locations of known offenders. I had the utmost confidence in turning over the complete operation of my sector to Officer Stevens in my absence."

As an example of his outstanding work, in March Officer Stevens performed a thorough fingerprint analysis of items in possession of a burglary suspect, and lifted prints which matched the suspect's fingerprint from one of the items. In July, Officer Stevens issued 112 traffic citations and initiated three occupied stolen vehicle arrests, each of the result of aggressive use of his MDT and alert patrol.

"As a direct result of Officer Stevens's efforts," said Sgt. Beane, "the other officers in the sector look up to him and admire him for his work. He has become the standard bearer for the sector.

"Officer Stevens had distinguished his career with the Park Police by his promotion to the rank of lieutenant and he was looking to a career in upper management when consolidation occurred. I feel that a man of less character, less commitment and less devotion to his chosen profession might not have persevered and become something other than a true professional," said Sgt. Beane. "Officer Stevens has accepted the challenges offered to him by the Dallas Police Department and met them like the dedicated law enforcement officer he is."

Officer Stevens has received three personal commendations since transferring to the Southeast Division, used no sick time, and been rated consistently as outstanding by his superviors.

Officer Stevens, wife Lisa, and daughter April reside in Terrell where they are members of First Christian Church. He is active in the adult Sunday School program there.

INNOVATIVE PROGRAMS FOR HOMELESS VETERANS FACE DANGER OF EXTINCTION

HON. G.V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, in recognition of survey studies which suggest that between 18 percent and 51 percent of our homeless population are veterans, the Congress developed two very innovative programs to address their plight: First, through Public Laws 100-6, 100-71, 100-322, and 100-628, an outreach and treatment program for chronically mentally ill homeless veterans was activated and perpetuated. The program has been implemented at 43 Veterans Administration medical centers across the Nation; and second, a program of domiciliary care for homeless veterans authorized by Public Law 100-71 is now providing treatment and rehabilitation services at 20 VA medical centers.

Mr. Speaker, there follows a summary of the status of these programs mandated by Congress as well as an overview of other services administered by the VA in an effort to better assist our homeless veterans:

The VA has a comprehensive network of health care services and a broad range of benefits for veterans. Many of these services, although not specifically designed for the homeless, have assisted homeless veterans or have prevented them from becoming homeless. In addition, the VA has two special programs that offer health care and rehabilitation services to homeless veterans.

THE PILOT HOMELESS CHRONICALLY MENTALLY ILL [HCMI] PROGRAM

The HCMI Program targets homeless veterans with psychiatric difficulties and operates from 43 VA medical care facilities located in 26 States and the District of Columbia. Although programs may vary from site to site, there are six basic components: First, aggressive outreach is conducted in the community to locate and offer services to homeless chronically mentally ill veterans. An assessment is undertaken to determine problems and any immediate health needs. Psychiatric and medical evaluations are conducted, and treatment is initiated. When indicated, care and rehabilitation are provided in community-based residential treatment facilities. Currently, the 43 HCMI veterans programs are maintaining contracts with 184 community-based facilities.

During its first 11 months, 10,524 veterans were assessed. They were, on average, 43 years old. Fifty-one point seven percent had served during the Vietnam era, 12.4 percent during the Korean conflict, and 10 percent during World War II. Eighty-three point one percent were either living in shelters or had no place at all to live; 21.2 percent had been homeless for more than 2 years. Nearly 80 percent of those assessed had serious general psychiatric or substance abuse disorders; 46 percent also had serious medical problems. Of those assessed, 2,124 veterans, 20 percent, have been placed in the community-based residential treatment facilities for continuing care and rehabilitation.

The principal conclusion of a recent HCMI report is that the program has been implemented as planned, and that it is providing demonstrably effective outreach, assessment, and treatment and referral services to large numbers of homeless mentally ill veterans across the country.

THE DOMICILIARY CARE FOR HOMELESS VETERANS [DCHV] PROGRAM

Operating at 20 VA medical centers, the DCHV Program is designed to provide homeless veterans with medical care and rehabilitation in a residential setting.

The program consists of 5 phases: community outreach and referral; admission screening and assessment; medical and psychiatric evaluation; treatment, vocational counseling and rehabilitation; and post-discharge community support.

Fourteen months after it was established, 838 beds were in operation, and 13 sites had waiting lists. In the first 7 months of operation, 2,273 veterans were assessed, 1,121 admitted, and 612 discharged from the program.

Nearly half of the veterans admitted were referred by other VA programs, 34.1 percent came from community outreach and 17.3 percent were self-referred. Nearly 90 percent were homeless or were at serious risk of becoming homeless; nearly 24 percent had been homeless for more than 1 year.

Veterans admitted were, on average, 42.9 years old. More than half served during the Vietnam era, 12.9 percent during the Korean conflict, and 6.3 percent during World War II. Veterans admitted to the program had serious medical and psychiatric disorders.

A recent report concluded that, in the year since the program began, it has been successfully put into operation at 20 sites around the country and has served several thousand homeless veterans.

GENERAL BENEFITS AND SERVICES THAT ASSIST HOMELESS VETERANS

VA administers several categories of compensation and pension programs: Disability compensation, dependency and indemnity compensation, death compensation, death pension, and disability pension.

Home retention services provide assistance to veterans who are in danger of losing their homes because of financial difficulties that are no fault of their own.

Vocational rehabilitation and counseling assists veterans with service-connected disabilities to achieve independence in daily living and, to the extent possible, become employable and maintain employment.

Outreach is conducted by the Veterans Assistance Service for special veteran populations, such as homeless veterans, to ensure that they are aware of benefits and services.

In the Fiduciary or Guardianship Program, the benefits of veterans determined to be incapable of managing their funds are managed by a fiduciary.

GENERAL MEDICAL SERVICES AND PROGRAMS THAT ASSIST HOMELESS VETERANS

Twenty-seven domiciliaries, includes DCHV program, provide treatment to eligible ambulatory veterans disabled by medical or psychiatric disorders, injury or age who do not need hospitalization or nursing home care.

Inpatient psychiatric services were provided in fiscal year 1987 in more than 22,000 psychiatric beds.

Outpatient services were offered in 170 mental health clinics, 74 day treatment centers, 36 day hospital programs, 103 alcohol-dependence treatment programs and 51 drug-dependence treatment programs.

VA supports contract care in community-based facilities for veterans with substance-abuse disorders.

Community residential care in private homes is provided to eligible veterans unable to live independently.

Readjustment Counseling Service operates a network of 194 Vietnam Veteran Outreach Centers [Vet Centers] where veterans receive counseling for a variety of problems. Each vet center has a homeless veterans' coordinator who works with private and public sector homeless groups, as well as conducts outreach in shelters and in the streets.

In fiscal year 1987, nearly 420,000 veterans received social work services for discharge planning from inpatient care, and more than one-half million veterans were assisted with health maintenance planning. Each medical center has a staff member who coordinates activities for homeless veterans and works with community groups that assist the homeless.

SPECIAL VA REGIONAL OFFICE EFFORTS TO ASSIST HOMELESS VETERANS

Each VA regional office has a designated staff member serving as coordinator and point of contact for homeless veterans. These individuals visit shelters and work with community homeless groups.

Homeless Eligibility Clarification Act enables eligible veterans without a fixed address to receive benefits' checks.

Shelter for homeless veterans through acquired property sales enables VA to sell acquired properties at discounted prices to State and local agencies, as well as nonprofit organizations, to provide shelter to the homeless.

Mr. Speaker, these programs and services are in imminent danger of termination. Though funds are nearly depleted, the administration is requesting no appropriation for the HCMI and DCHV programs in fiscal 1990.

Denying continuation of these programs, particularly in light of their immeasurable impact in assisting scores of homeless veterans, would be a tragic mistake. We simply must sustain these efforts with adequate funding.

LITHUANIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. PETER J. VISCLOSKY

OF INDIANA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. VISCLOSKY. Mr. Speaker, today I note that the 71st anniversary of the establishment of the Lithuanian Republic will be observed on February 16, 1989. Lithuanians across the world will again mark their commitment to freedom and democratic principles. Yet, this day also serves as a grim reminder of those who suffered and died to achieve that independence, and those who continue to struggle under the repressive Soviet presence in the region.

It is appropriate that we recognize and commend the Lithuanian Republic and her people, who enjoyed 22 years of independence before forced annexation by the Soviet Union in 1940. Since this annexation the Lithuanian people have courageously withstood nearly five decades of suppression under both Nazi and Soviet forces. Despite continued hardships, they have not wavered in their peaceful and valiant struggle to regain their independence.

As the Member of Congress representing the First District of Indiana, I proudly note that a significant number of Lithuanians reside in my district. These hard working, proud people have provided numerous contributions to northwestern Indiana. From their example I have come to hold a great deal of respect for them, their heritage and their desire for an independent Lithuania.

The United States has refused to recognize the Soviet Union's presence in Lithuania as legitimate. It is important that we continue to support Lithuania by strenuously advocating and encouraging the Soviet Union to withdraw from their illegal occupation. In this era of glasnost, it is my hope that the U.S.S.R. will reexamine and reverse their immoral policy toward Lithuania.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. BILL NELSON

OF FLORIDA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, due to business in my district in the State of Florida, I was not present to vote on the motion to adjourn offered by Representative COELHO on February 6, 1989. Had I been present, I would have voted "no."

G. STEWART FRANCKE: A MAN WHO GOT THE JOB DONE

HON. BOB TRAXLER

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. TRAXLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call the attention of our colleagues to one of my constituents who is truly an individual who demonstrated that anything is possible if you devote your energies toward it.

After nearly 40 years of automotive industry service, G. Stewart Francke, a resident of Au Gres, MI, is retiring from General Motors. He started what has to be considered an exemplary career working as a field representative for the General Motors Acceptance Corporation in Saginaw and Flint in 1949.

Having honed his financial skills, he then moved on as an officer of the Draper Group, which included Motor Finance Co., Cardinal Credit Corp., Draper Chevrolet, Motor Leasing Co., and American Vanguard Life Insurance. An individual does not gain this kind of responsibility unless it is earned, and in this position he certainly earned the respect of his colleagues.

But Stewart Francke remembered that everyone should try to provide some services to his community. As a result he served on the Saginaw City Council from 1959 to 1967, and as mayor of Saginaw from 1961 to 1965. He was president of the Michigan Municipal League in 1965, and still found time to serve at various times on the Saginaw County Board of Supervisors, the Tri-City Airport Commission, the Saginaw Valley College Board of Fellows, and the State of Michigan Boundary Commission.

His involvement with government provided the natural bridge for his new position with the General Motors Industry-Government Relations staff. He joined General Motors Corp. in 1971 and served as regional manager in the Mid-Atlantic region until 1975 when he was transferred to Lansing, as regional manager covering Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

Since 1982 he has served as director of State and local government relations for General Motors in Detroit, and he was promoted to executive director for Industry Government Relations in June 1987.

Stewart and his wife Katherine live in Birmingham, MI, while his work requires him to be near Detroit. He then returns to Au Gres for the free time that we all value. I am sure that they will both enjoy being able to take advantage of this time in the days to come.

So often we hear of individuals who have an accomplishment and then decide that nothing more need be done. G. Stewart Francke is not that kind of man, and I am sure the culmination of his days at GM will only result in new challenges for him to meet.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all of our colleagues will join me in wishing him the very best for the future.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET PROCESS

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, January 11, 1989 into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE FEDERAL BUDGET PROCESS

Although action on the federal budget at times seems chaotic and confusing, there is clear structure to the budget process. It stretches from early January to mid-October, and dominates the congressional calendar. The following is a sketch of the budget schedule for 1989.

The President's Budget: On January 9, President Reagan sent to the Congress his 1990 budget, covering the fiscal year that runs from October 1, 1989 to September 30, 1990. The budget sets out his spending and revenue recommendations for all current federal programs as well as any new programs he proposes. The Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction law requires that the budget deficit in 1990 cannot exceed $100 billion. Future budgets will have lower deficit targets, with a balanced budget required by Gramm-Rudman by 1993.

The outgoing Reagan Administration, rather than the incoming Bush Administration, is responsible for preparing the 1990 budget. Incoming Presidents are not required to submit revisions to the Congress, but all recent Presidents have. Mr. Bush has announced that he will submit a revised 1990 budget.

The congressional budget resolution: In February and March, the House and Senate Budget Committees will be working on the congressional budget resolution for 1990. Like the President's budget, the congressional budget plan cannot exceed the $100 billion Gramm-Rudman deficit limit. The congressional budget resolution does not make detailed decisions about spending for particular programs. Rather, it sets overall targets for revenues, spending, and the deficit, and for various broad categories of spending. The deadline for final passage of the House-Senate budget agreement is April 15. The budget resolution is a blueprint for the Congress, and does not require the President's signature.

The appropriations process: The House and Senate Appropriations Committees then take the limit on total appropriations and the various spending priorities set by the budget resolution and subdivide the total among the 13 regular annual appropriations bills (for example, one for defense, one for agriculture). Any appropriations bill that exceeds these limits can be ruled out of order. The deadline for the House to complete consideration of all 13 bills is June 30. Senate action and House-Senate conferences then follow. If the regular appropriations bill are not passed by the Congress and approved by President Bush before the fiscal year begins on October 1, a stop-gap "continuing resolution" must be passed in order to prevent government services from shutting down. Last year, all 13 appropriations bills were approved on schedule, the first time in 12 years that a continuing resolution was not needed.

The reconciliation process: The reconciliation process is used to produce deficit reductions in areas not subject to control through the appropriations process. For example, it can be used to achieve savings in entitlement programs like farm supports and food stamps, where all those who meet the eligibility requirements are entitled to receive certain benefits. Savings in these programs can only be achieved by revising the law rather than changing the level of funding.

The congressional budget resolution usually includes reconciliation instructions directing House and Senate committees to modify programs under their jurisdiction to produce specified savings. These measures are then assembled into an omnibus reconciliation bill, which the Congress must complete by June 15. It then goes to the President for his signature.

The debt limit: The Congress by law limits the authority of the executive branch to borrow funds needed to carry out federal programs. Legislation raising this ceiling is required periodically, with the approval of both the Congress and the President. A debt ceiling level for the coming year is automatically set by the House when it passes the budget resolution. However, this legislation may be amended in the Senate, thereby requiring further House action. The debt ceiling will have to be increased in 1989, as the current limit on the national debt, $2.8 trillion, will be reached sometime this summer or early fall.

Gramm-Rudman sequestration: The Gramm-Rudman law has a mechanism to enforce its deficit limits through automatic spending cuts, referred to as "sequestration". These automatic cuts will be triggered if the deficit for the coming fiscal year is projected to exceed the limit by more than $10 billion—that is, exceeding $110 billion in 1990. The President's Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has final authority over estimating the deficit and calculating what automatic cuts would be required under the Gramm-Rudman law. OMB will issue a preliminary 1990 deficit estimate on August 25, and a final one on October 15. If at that time the projected deficit still exceeds the limit, President Bush will issue a spending reduction order implementing the cuts needed to bring it down to $100 billion. Since the Gramm-Rudman law went into effect in 1985, sequestration has been required only once.

Making this budget process work is not easy. Difficulty is to be expected when we are dealing with a trillion-dollar budget that encompasses numerous national priorities. There are never enough resources to carry out all the desired activities, and tough choices must be made on the most controversial issues of the day. Yet the budget process has become cumbersome under normal circumstances, and almost paralyzed under stress. The time has come for reform. We need to cut down on the number of times the same budget issue is considered in committee and on the floor, make it more difficult to miss deadlines, reduce the number of line items in the appropriations bills to curb micromanagement, and shift to a two-year budget cycle, which forces us to take a broader view of the budget and how it impacts on the economy. At the same time, such reforms cannot guarantee success if the Congress and the White House engage in drawn out political posturing and put off serious budget negotiation. We not only need to simplify and improve the basic budget mechanism, we need to strengthen our political will to move the budget through more quickly.

IN HONOR OF LEO A. BERNIER

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, on February 18, a very important dinner will be held in my congressional district, honoring Leo A. Bernier, Jr., of Swansea, MA. Leo Bernier was elected State commander for Massachusetts for the American Legion last July, at the convention in Worcester. This was an honor that was extremely well deserved. Commander Bernier is one of the most admired, respected and genuinely well-like civic leaders in our State. He combines a gentleness of manner with a toughness of mind that makes him an important advocate for those veterans who find themselves in need of some sort of help. I have known Leo Bernier since 1982, and I have been the beneficiary of his advice, encouragement, and information about veterans' programs.

Commander Bernier was for 29 years a member of the mathematics department at Case High School in Swansea. Now retired, he serves as sealer of weights and measures in his town, and he continues to be active in a variety of ways. But it is in his capacity as a leader in the American Legion—and in the past 9 months as its State commander—that I have had the most to do with Leo.

He understands that a great nation like ours acts in its own enlightened self interest when it honors its promises to the veterans. The young men and women who went off to war to save civilization in 1941 to 1945, the people who sacrificed in Korea and in Vietnam, and all of those who have served our country in difficult and dangerous times, deserve far more than we can ever give them. The very least we can do is to maintain our promises to provide medical assistance, educational help, financial assistance when necessary, and the other basic services we have committed ourselves to.

Leo Bernier has been a staunch advocate of sensible and reasonable policies to discharge our commitments to the veterans. I consider it an honor to have been able to work with him in the past and I look forward to continuing to work with him in helping America live up to its promises.

THE COMPREHENSIVE HEALTH CARE IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1989

HON. MARTIN OLAV SABO

OF MINNESOTA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. SABO. Mr. Speaker, today more than 37 million Americans don't have health insurance of any kind and millions more lack adequate coverage. This is a national tragedy that we can no longer ignore. It is unconscionable that the United States lets one in six of its citizens go without even the most basic protection.

The good news is that the problem is finally getting some serious attention. It was widely debated in the Presidential campaign. The most prominent proposals on Capital Hill—the one offered by Senator KENNEDY—was approved by his committee last year. And a national commission has offered a suggestion on how to ensure universal coverage.

The bad news is that we have yet to take action. I am convinced that we must make it a top priority to repair the deficiencies in a system that lets so many people slip through the cracks.

Today we have three realistic options: The simplest is to do nothing and continue to ignore the problem. To me this would be totally irresponsible and shouldn't be considered seriously. The second option is to greatly expand Government programs such as Medicaid. The third is to build on the existing system of private insurance and fill in its gaps.

I believe the third option makes the most sense. It would be the most effective solution and the most politically feasible and acceptable.

The current system works fairly well for most Americans. We don't have to make drastic changes in it nor do we need to create large, new bureaucracies. Instead, by patching the holes in the existing system we can ensure that all Americans have access to comprehensive and affordable health insurance.

Today I introduced legislation to do just that. The Comprehensive Health Care Improvement Act of 1989 would guarantee that all Americans have access to health insurance at group rates, help poor people buy coverage, and protect Americans of all ages from truly catastrophic health-care costs.

FAR TOO MANY UNINSURED

This bill is an updated version of legislation I introduced during each of the previous five sessions since 1979. In the last decade, the problem has grown dramatically and the need to do something about it has become even more glaring. The number of uninsured grew from 29 million in 1979 to 37 million in 1984. It has stayed at this high number since then.

Who are the uninsured Americans? More than 12 million are children. Nearly half live in families where someone works full-time all year; almost all of the rest live with someone who works at least part time on or part of the year. Almost three-fourths of all uninsured workers earn less than $10,000 a year; nearly all earn less than $20,000. In general, the uninsured are poorer, younger, work for smaller firms, and earn lower wages than the insured.

The main reason the number of uninsured jumped by 8 million in 5 short years is that fewer people are gaining coverage through another family member. The rate of coverage has gone down for children and spouses, groups who often depend on someone else for coverage have traditionally had high coverage rates.

Moreover, today smaller percentages of the population are children or spouses. The last of the baby boomers are now in their twenties and a larger share of the population is single. Single young adults have the lowest coverage rates. A third of the working uninsured are between the ages of 18 and 24; half are under 30.

Another factor is that the service sector, which has lower rates of coverage, is a larger share of the economy. Conversely, the goods-producing and public sectors, which have higher coverage rates, are a smaller portion.

The uninsured are less likely to seek needed medical attention and they have trouble getting it when they do. Because they often put off getting care until a condition is more severe, they are more likely to end up in emergency rooms, a more expensive place to treat patients. When they are treated, there is evidence that they may get different, cheaper kinds of care than those from whom payment is guaranteed.

Having so many uninsured also has its public and private costs. Although the uninsured receive less care than the insured, they still get some care. That care has to be paid for by someone. Governments subsidize hospitals to cover some of the cost of uncompensated care.

But, in 1986, hospitals lost an estimated $7 billion because of unpaid bills, 5 percent of all hospital expenses. Hospitals either absorb the rest of these costs by taking losses or pass them on in higher fees to those who have insurance.

PROVIDING ACCESS TO COVERAGE

Here's how my proposal would address the problem:

First, we need to provide access to affordable health insurance. To take care of most of the uninsured, my bill would require businesses with 10 or more employees to offer coverage to their workers. The plans would have to cover dependents. State and local governments and nonprofit organizations would also be required to meet this mandate.

Firms would not be required to pay the premiums and employees would not have to accept an offered plan. But at least most people would gain access to good coverage at group rates. Ensuring access should be our first priority.

In order to provide access to affordable insurance for the rest of the uninsured—those who work for smaller firms, the self-employed, and the unemployed—States would be required to establish insurance pools of all health-insurance companies doing business in the State. In other words, a group of all people not eligible for regular group plans would be created. Anyone, including businesses, could buy insurance from the pool.

Rural Americans—who are more likely to lack insurance than urban Americans—would be helped by the pools. One-third of agricultural workers and their families are uninsured.

My bill places a cap on the premium that could be charged for a pool policy to ensure that it remains affordable. States would administer the pools and determine how best to cover pool losses. Options they might consider are using general revenues, levying some kind of a tax, and assessing insurers and self-insurers directly.

My bill sets minimum standards for the plans businesses must offer. Besides covering dependents, the plans must pay at least 80 percent of covered costs, have deductibles of not more than $250, and limit out-of-pocket expenses to $3,000. They must be continuable for 1 year after an individual leaves a job, allowing coverage to continue at group rates, and convertible after that. Businesses must also offer a health maintenance organization [HMO] plan that meets these minimum standards. The pools must offer at least two plans: One that meets the standards and a cheaper one, which has a deductible of up to $1,000.

HELP FOR THE POOR

The first part of the bill ensures that all Americans have access to insurance. While most of the uninsured are poor, many could afford to pay for at least part of their own insurance if they could get it at group rates. Nearly one in five of the uninsured—8.4 million—live in families with incomes of more than $30,000. More than 5 million are in households with incomes above $40,000.

But many individuals and families may have a tough time paying. They may not qualify for Medicaid and it may still be difficult, if not impossible, for them to afford insurance.

To help these people, my bill establishes an optional State-Federal Low-Income Assistance Program. Each State could design a program that best meets its needs. States could experiment with such alternatives as sliding-fee schedules, subsidizing premiums completely, and cost-sharing.

The Federal Government would pay half the program's cost up to a maximum of $10 times a State's population. If every State participated fully, the maximum Federal liability would be about $2.5 billion.

PROTECTION FROM CATASTROPHIC ILLNESSES

Last year Congress adopted legislation to protect senior citizens from catastrophic health-care costs. But we should protect young and old alike from the loss of their homes, businesses, or the bulk of their assets because of an extremely expensive illness. Financial ruin is just as serious, if not more so, for a young family.

We should ensure that no one is left destitute from a catastrophic illness. The third part of my bill would do that by creating an optional State-Federal Catastrophic Health Insurance Program. After an individual exhausts his or her existing medical coverage, the program would cover 90 percent of all costs that exceed certain income thresholds. The thresholds are: The greater of $2,500 or 30 percent of household income up to $25,000, 40 percent of income between $25,000 and $40,000, and 50 percent of income over $40,000.

This program would not be a substitute for conventional catastrophic insurance. The income thresholds are designed to be high enough to encourage people to obtain good catastrophic coverage of their own and ensure that only truly catastrophic illnesses are covered. But they will still ensure that people are not financially ruined.

The Federal Government would pay three-fourths of the catastrophic program's cost up to $2.50 times a State's population. If every State participates fully, the maximum Federal cost would be about $618 million.

ADVANTAGES OF THE SABO PLAN

While there are similarities between my plan and other prominent proposals, there are also many differences. The concept I have outlined has several advantages:

First, it is truly comprehensive. It provides access to good coverage for everyone, not just workers and their dependents.

Second, using State pools and having States run the programs gives us greater flexibility. It allows us to take advantage of existing expertise and bureaucracies. It encourages States to experiment with innovative approaches and tailor their programs to meet unique local needs and conditions.

Third, it would in no way be disruptive or burdensome for American businesses. In fact, it would help small businesses provide a much-needed benefit for themselves and their employees. Marginal or new businesses would not have to take on additional costs, but would still have access to coverage.

Fourth, it offers catastrophic protection for everyone, not just the elderly.

By building constructively on the existing system we can ensure that all Americans have access to affordable quality care. My plan does that. It is an approach around which a political consensus can be built.

The bottom line is that we can no longer delay taking action. The problem is too big, too costly, too tragic for millions, and too harmful to our fellow citizens. Far too many people are left out. We should start taking the steps today that will solve the problem. A nation as wealthy as ours should do no less.

TRIBUTE TO DONALD L. BAUER

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, in these times of transition in administrations, often unnoticed are those dedicated men and women who work daily to maintain an effective Federal Government—the professional civil servants. In my mind, one of our finest civil servants was Donald L. Bauer, who retired from the Department of Energy recently after 30 years of Government service. In the years I knew him, Don exemplified the personal integrity, diligence, and good judgment that we hope our Government would represent.

As a Congressman focused on specific interests, I have had disagreements with Don. Yet his candor and directness always led to understandings of his decisions. And his decisions were always objective and well founded. As a result, Don was able to make the Government work both for the policymakers he served and the taxpayers he was obligated to protect.

Don retired as the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary for Fossil Energy. Prior to the appointment of the current Assistant Secretary, Allen Wampler, Don served as Acting Assistant Secretary for 1½ years. As such, he played a critical role in the establishment of the Clean Coal Technology Program—a program aimed at reducing coal emissions and promoting energy security. Don's responsibilities included the Fossil Energy Research and Development Programs, the strategic petroleum reserves and the Naval petroleum reserves. Finally, Don's leadership contributed to the successful operation and eventual return to the private sector of the Great Plains Coal Gasification Plant. Following Mr. Wampler's appointment, Don continued to serve him and the Department with skill, loyalty, and dedication.

I know I speak for many of my colleagues in saying that we will miss Don. We need more like him.

Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably detained and could not make rollcall vote No. 5. Had I been present I would have voted "nay."

GRAHAM CLAYTOR: RAILROADER OF THE YEAR

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, in the face of 8 years of hostility from the Reagan administration, the Nation's passenger railroad, Amtrak, has not only survived but grown stronger. In fact, 1988 was Amtrak's best year ever in terms of revenues, operating ratio, and ridership. Noting these achievements, the magazine Modern Railroads in its January 1989 issue bestowed its annual "Railroader of the Year" title upon W. Graham Claytor, Jr., Amtrak's president and chairman since 1982. I want to congratulate my friend Graham Claytor for this well-deserved recognition.

I recall standing here in the well more than a year ago calling Graham one of the finest railroaders in America. But I suppose we can now say that he has been crowned the most outstanding, and the job he has done at Amtrak tells the story. These accomplishments are summarized in the Modern Railroads piece, which I will insert in the RECORD at the conclusion of these remarks.

Frankly, it is incredible that year after year, without regard to Amtrak's steadily improving performance and its steadily decreasing subsidy, the Reagan administration saw fit to propose the railroad's elimination. Hopefully, President Bush will take a more positive view toward the concept of a national passenger railroad and not allow himself to become tethered to an ideologically based position that has little support in Congress or among the American people.

Our committee this year will be working on a reauthorization of Amtrak. Graham Claytor will be an active participant in that process, and I look forward as always to working with him. For his many years of devoted public service and his successful stewardship of the people's railroad, we say thank you—and we look forward to Graham's continued and lasting leadership. With that, Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Modern Railroads article mentioned above be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

[From Modern Railroads, January 1989]

BREATHING LIFE—AND A FUTURE—INTO AMTRAK

(By Greg Borzo)

Three years ago, Amtrak did not seek private financing to purchase the new cars and locomotives it needed. Perhaps it knew better than to try. At worst, loans would have been denied; at best, they would have been difficult to secure, even at a premium rate.

At that time, Amtrak's very future was in question. The Reagan Administration had again requested zero dollars for Amtrak—a position that would be taken four years in a row. As long as it seemed destined for extinction, Amtrak's ability to repay loans was on a par with, let's say, Brazil's.

During the last several months, however, Amtrak has secured financing for 100 new passenger cars from the builder and an affiliated financier. Last year it did the same for new locomotives, and just recently refinanced the transaction with a third party. These funds, extended on very competitive terms, marked Amtrak's first major entry into the financial market in almost a decade. The good credit rating says a lot about Amtrak's new vigorous health; most of all, it says that the national passenger railroad system is here to stay.

"It's very difficult to get any kind of money when they think you might be out of business within a year; that doesn't do anything for your credit," said. W. Graham Claytor Jr., president and chairman of the board of Amtrak since 1982. "How well we do is going to depend, to a great extent, on whether or not we get enough capital to keep moving. I'm confident we'll get it."

For turning Amtrak around and for leading Amtrak to its best year in revenue, operating ratio and ridership—as well as just about any other yardstick—Claytor has been named Modern Railroads' Railroader of the Year for 1989.

In a way, Amtrak's improved standing in the financial community tells the whole story. Lenders who once didn't want to talk to Amtrak are now willing to extend credit. Why?

Because revenue keeps growing. From 1981 to 1988 (fiscal years), it grew more than 30 percent, after accounting for inflation.

Because Amtrak's revenue-to-cost ratio, or operating ratio, has improved steadily from 48 percent in 1981 to 60 percent in 1988.

Because ridership continues to grow; in fact Amtrak has to turn away customers for want of equipment. With sold-out trains in the West and 200,000 standees in the Northeast Corridor last year, new equipment is a sound investment.

Because, for the second year in a row, Amtrak covers all short term, above the rail costs with revenue.

And because it's the one major railroad that has managed to reduce labor costs and keep them in line.

Amtrak's improved standing in the financial community is a vote of confidence in the man at the helm and demonstrates that Amtrak is capable of solving its own problems rather than relying on the federal government.

"We've already done a significant amount of private financing. If we get more federal funds, it will be easier to get more private financing. Even just words of support from Washington—which we are now getting [from President-elect Bush]—will help us get financing on the outside."

CREATIVE "REVENUING"

Besides seeking capital funds from financial institutions, Claytor has generated much-needed capital by exploring new revenue options. In 1987, for example, Amtrak began carrying some 10 million yearly commuters under contract for the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority. In 1988, that grew to 15 million. Next, Claytor hopes to provide similar services for transit agencies in Connecticut and Florida, for Caltrans, and for the Virginia Railway Express' proposed services out of Washington, D.C.

Real estate development represents another promising area. With 70 acres of air rights in downtown Philadelphia, and extensive center-city property in Chicago, New York and Washington, D.C., Amtrak is sitting pretty. Development of these properties, and station renovation including leases to commercial ventures, will generate significant new revenue.

Mail and express freight also generate profit and represent potential earnings. This traffic has been growing at eight to 10 percent a year during the past several years. Claytor expects Amtrak to carry more and more of it—but only where it's profitable.

Amtrak is selling its passenger seat reservation system to Via Rail in Canada, and has negotiations under way with Australia and France. This leads Claytor to hope that the system may become an international standard.

But most "extra" revenue in 1988, about $30 million, was generated by the corporate development department. This includes leasing the right-of-way for fiber optics; leasing equipment, such as high speed tampers and track laying machinery; track work and welding rail, mostly for commuter lines; and assembling rail cars. Even safe harbor leasing still generates a few million a year, although it lessens every year.

Amtrak's aggressive pursuit of new revenue streams has raised a few objections in the rail supply industry. Some suppliers believe that Amtrak benefits from an unfair competitive advantage because it receives federal funds, but Claytor claims that the suppliers just don't want the competition.

"Congress said that we should reduce the federal budget deficit by making a profit on anything we could," he said. "It also said, from the very beginning, that we have to include in our bid all capital costs that you would have to include if you were a fully private operation. We lean over backwards in that area. In fact, we load it up so much that we've lost a lot of bids."

Claytor pointed out that some politicians think Amtrak should in fact be given preferential treatment when it comes to providing car assembly or contracting services for transit agencies. That would help reduce the budget deficit since transit agencies are typically supported with federal funds. Claytor was quick to point out, however, that Amtrak does not take this position.

CONTROLLING COSTS

Claytor has also improved the bottom line by controlling costs. Amtrak's operating expenditures declined 6 percent in constant dollars, between 1981 and 1987. Claytor points to high labor productivity for much of this gain. Between 1980 and 1988, cumulative wage increases totaled 34 percent vs. 48 percent for the rail industry as a whole. All told, Amtrak saves more than $200 million a year due to favorable labor conditions, such as reduced crew sizes, elimination of arbitraries, and hourly pay scales, rather than paying on the basis of miles traveled.

Amtrak is the only Class I with these innovative work rules across the board, although all the other major railroads would jump at the chance to implement them. For the most part, the rules grew out of congressional action that gave Amtrak the opportunity to renegotiate labor conditions as the railroad was created and subsequently remade. Neither Claytor nor (it seems) anyone else has a formula on how to make these work rules rub off on Class I's. When asked if he had any suggestions to fellow railroad presidents on how to do away with the 108-miles day or superfluous train crew positions he answered, "It's to the unions that I'd like to make some suggestions!"

One of Claytor's major achievements is covering all short term avoidable operating costs with route revenues, systemwide. Before his arrival, route revenues covered only 73 percent of these costs; today that figure is 115 percent. This doesn't mean Amtrak is in the black, nor that it will ever be. But it does mean that the railroad should be able to continue to reduce its reliance on federal subsidies, which fell from $900 million in 1981 to $581 million in 1988, a drop of more than 50 percent in constant dollars.

WORKING WITH FREIGHT LINES

Claytor has worked hard to improve the sometimes-troubled relationships between Amtrak and the major freight railroads. He is especially qualified for this task because he headed the Southern Railway from 1967 to 1976. He knows freight railroading, as well as many of the industry's key players.

"Running Amtrak is not all that different from running a freight railroad," he said. "We're in the same business so we've got to work together."

If all railroad presidents shared this view, however, Claytor's job would be much easier. Although he describes Amtrak's relationship with freight railroads as "excellent," there are some inherent differences between the priorities of freight and passenger railroading.

Track conditions and resultant speed limits constitute perhaps the biggest rift. Railroads don't want the expense of maintaining track up to the standards needed for Amtrak's faster trains. In perhaps the most recent example of this industrywide dilemma, Burlington Northern Railroad in October told Amtrak that it would have to limit its trains to the same speeds as BN's freight trains. In many cases this will require Amtrak to reduce its train speeds and alter its schedules.

BN says that speed differentials cause congestion now that traffic levels are relatively high. The issue is being negotiated.

On a subject related to good track maintenance, Claytor would like freight railroads to do more to help Amtrak improve its on-time performance, an area in which things are getting worse. In 1983, 82 percent of Amtrak's trains were on time. That figure has dropped steadily to 71 percent for 1988.

"The Metroliners were at about 90 percent [on time], but off-corridor our on-time performance has been dreadful this year," he said. "The increase in freight business is the main reason, and one of the principal problems has been freight derailments. One derailment can hold up as many as a dozen of our trains."

Incentive contracts, which reward railroads for on-time performance, should help solve this, according to Claytor, even though the railroads without such contracts are not necessarily the ones with the worst on-time records. "The incentive contract is the most important thing in resolving this," Claytor said. "Some lines like Santa Fe and Conrail don't have them, but I expect the idea to spread. Dick Sanborn, who takes over at Conrail in January, assures me that it's one of the first things he will do."

Problems with on-time performance and sharing track are not limited to freight railroads. Claytor complained about how difficult it is to share the right-of-way with some commuter agencies in and around New York City. "Since they do the dispatching, they can stick you behind their commuter trains," he said.

BARRIER TO GROWTH

Amtrak seems bristling with enthusiasm and eager for the chance to grow . . . if it could just get more equipment. Help is on the way. The 100 new coaches on order from Bombardier will relieve some of the pressure and will help assure passengers on existing routes a seat on a well maintained car—something Amtrak has not been able to guarantee up till now.

"Last summer we overutilized equipment in order to try to meet demand," Claytor said. "This year we won't do that. By next summer we won't have shoddy equipment," partly because of the new capacity and also because he says he would now rather turn passengers away than give them a bad experience with Amtrak.

Unfortunately, the new cars will not make expansion possible, even though Amtrak has identified several new routes it would like to start up. Except for an extension of an existing route into Houston last November, no new intercity services are in the works. Instead, the limited number of new cars likely to come on line within the next few years will go toward relieving equipment overutilization and toward making Amtrak's three, thrice weekly trains daily.

Some future car needs will be met by the Viewliner, the single-level sleeper now being run through extensive revenue-service testing. Claytor expects that within 10 years the Viewliner will have replaced most of the Heritage cars, but he does not anticipate placing the first order for Viewliners until 1990.

Locomotives have also been overutilized, but Claytor believes the additional units on order and recently delivered should resolve the shortage. Improvements in locomotive shop maintenance procedures will help, too. Amtrak has begun to use a production line for locomotive repairs and overhauls.

"The next area where we can greatly increase productivity is in our maintenance costs . . . which has been pretty inefficient," Claytor explained. With a production line, "the same guy does the same work on every engine so he becomes a specialist. We're turning out far more locomotives."

Claytor also plans to increase locomotive availability by employing units that need less maintenance, i.e., locomotives that use ac traction motors.

"I hope to never have to buy another new dc traction-motor unit," he said, adding that the U.S. locomotive builders didn't want to switch because of the expense. "We forced their hand by going to Europe. EMD [Electro-Motive Division] might not have built us any [ac traction locomotives] except that they found out that I was taking delivery on two Brown Boveri units. I hope GE [General Electric] will build us ac traction motors, too."

Amtrak's future is more promising today than ever before, thanks in part to the leadership of W. Graham Claytor, Jr. But as promising as that future may be, it is chockfull of questions and potential pitfalls. In some ways, the proposed Boston-New York high speed service is indicative of Amtrak's situation: a modest amount of money will help set up a service in great demand. About $400 million for equipment and minimal track work would suffice to develop a three-hour Boston-New York run. That's not all that much, considering the tens of billions of dollars spent on new highways or airport improvements every year.

"The problem with a high speed line from Boston to New York is only money," Claytor said. He believes that the proposed service could make an operating profit, but not a favorable enough return on investment to attract financial institutions.

"We'd be delighted to run the service, but we're not in a position to buy the equipment. Now if CONEG [Coalition of Northeastern Governors] or the states come up with the money. . . ."

In other words, Amtrak can provide a useful, efficient service, but the politicans and the public have to decide to what extent they are willing to support that service. Under Claytor, that service has improved dramatically—and Amtrak has come to deserve that support more than ever.

LAWRENCE, MA, CABLE OUTLET WINS HONORS

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, it's been said that one-third of the population of this country is Republican, one-third of the country is Democratic and the other third is watching cable TV.

The growth of cable television has been a boon to everyone, particularly those of us interested in watching public affairs shows and those of us who are asked to appear on such programs.

The cable outlet that serves the city of Lawrence, MA, in my district, Continental Cablevision, channel 3, recently won the top award for cable TV public affairs programming in 1988 from the Massachusetts Cable Television Commission.

The award was given to the program "CTV-3 Reports" for its indepth coverage of a jail uprising last July. Singled out for honors were Continental's Lawrence program director and producer Maurice Bresnahan, anchor-writer Audrey Laganas and camera man Martin Minahan.

The award for channel 3 was one of 11 won by Continental Cablevision producers and community volunteers across Massachusetts—nearly half the 24 winners chosen from 360 entries statewide.

Continental's coverage of the Lawrence jail riot was also one only a handful of cable television programs among those of many broadcast network affiliates cited by the prestigious Broadcasting magazine for its "Best of Local TV Journalism" honor.

I salute the producers, reporters, technicians, managers, and volunteers of Continental Cablevision for their commitment to in-depth coverage of community affairs.

TRIBUTE TO THE ESSEX COUNTY CHAMBER OF LINKS

HON. DONALD M. PAYNE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. PAYNE of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my colleagues here in Congress to join me in recognizing the accomplishments of a special organization and the contributions of a special individual.

In my hometown of Newark, NJ, the Essex County Chamber of Links recently launched its Arts Extravaganza Gala Benefit featuring the internationally renowned and multi-Grammy Award-winning trumpet virtuoso Wynton Marsalis. This major fundraiser and benefit concert was held on February 3, 1989 at the historic Newark Symphony Hall.

The Essex County Links is the local chapter of a 42-year-old women's organization which was founded in 1946 in the city of Philadelphia for the purpose of supporting educational, cultural, and civic activities and programs.

This fine and benevolent organization has since established 223 chapters in 38 States and the District of Columbia.

Under the astute leadership of its dedicated officers, the Essex Links is actively involved in such programs as summer camperships for elementary and middle school children, SAT preparation for inner city youth and international campaigns against hunger and poverty. Through its Africare Program, a component of the International Student Exchange Program, the Essex Links is currently coordinating the adoption of African children to provide financial support for their growth and development.

Donating his valuable time and talent in support of the Essex Links programs is Mr. Wynton Marsalis, who was given his first trumpet at the age of 6 by the legendary trumpeter, Al Hirt. Wynton began touring at an early age with jazz greats, the likes of Art Blakey, Herbie Hancock, Ron Carter, Tony Williams, and others before soon being recognized for his own extraordinary musical talents. In 1982, Wynton's debut album "Wynton Marsalis" was the unanimous choice for "Jazz L.P. of the Year" and was the beginning of a 6-year period whereby he earned eight Grammy Awards and became the only artist to win this coveted award for 5 consecutive years.

As a token of their appreciation and support for the Essex Links programs and the Wynton Marsalis fundraising concert, the Newark Municipal Council presented a commendatory resolution to Essex County Links, Inc., and a resolution to Mr. Marsalis declaring February 3, 1989 to be Wynton Marsalis Day within the city of Newark, NJ.

I know that my colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives join me in honoring the Essex County Links for their dedicated work, and in expressing appreciation to Mr. Wynton Marsalis for his generosity.

A LEADER OF TOMORROW SPEAKS OUT ON ASSAULT WEAPONS

HON. FORTNEY PETE STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, Art Linkletter was known for his phrase, "Kids say the darndest things." Well, when it comes to writing their elected officials, today's youth more than likely say the smartest things.

I've received hundreds of letters in the past few days expressing support for the efforts of the California Law Enforcement Task Force on Assault Weapons recommendations for future legislation. As you know, these recommendations are the police and law enforcement efforts to ban assault weapons—weapons commonly used to kill other human beings by drug dealers, violent criminals, terrorists, and psychopaths.

One of the most poignant, articulate letters came from an alert teenager I'd like to share it with you:

My name is Jason Minetti. I am a boy scout from troop 905, Dublin, CA. I am working on the Citizenship in the Nation. I have to write a letter to the Congressman in my district on a national issue that concerns me.

My concern is about the recent shooting at the school in Stockton, CA. My concern is about the use of a weapon that is only used for killing people. I think that they should ban army style weapons because there is no use for them except killing people.

My brother, my father and I are legitimate sportsmen who enjoy target shooting and hunting. We enjoy our constitutional right to own guns but we do not feel that there is a need to sell assault weapons.

Thank you for your concern.

JASON P. MINETTI,
Dublin, CA.

A TRIBUTE TO CHARLES PARKER

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise today in honor of one of our Nation's most dedicated and respected teachers, Charles Parker, who has been given the honor of being named the National Agriscience Teacher of the Year during the 61st National Convention in November.

Charles Parker is a teacher at Kingsburg High School in Kingsburg, CA. He is the third consecutive teacher from California to be honored with this award. It is always a pleasure to hear of such great achievements in the field of education, and such dedicated and hard working educators as Mr. Parker.

Mr. Speaker, Charles Parker has shown an excellent example of a job well done, and I would like to take this time to extend my deepest appreciation to him for his accomplishments as an educator of the agrisciences for our youth and our Nation.

MOURNING THE DEATH OF EDWARD R. LAMON

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Edward R. Lamon, an outstanding labor leader in the State of Maryland, whose death has left a legacy of integrity and resolve in which every union member in my State can take pride.

As president of the Maryland State and District of Columbia AFL–CIO for the past 5 years, Ed has worked diligently for a better standard of living for all working persons. Ed's career as a trade unionist began in 1959 as a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local No. 24. He rose through the ranks of Maryland's labor movement and was chosen to direct the Committee on Political Education [COPE] of the AFL–CIO in Maryland in 1973. He held this position for a decade, steering labor legislation through the Maryland State Legislature, while gaining the respect of elected officials in my State.

Ed's interest in politics began early in his career, when he worked for Senator Hubert Humphrey's Presidential campaign in the 1960's. From that point on, Ed worked on countless campaigns, advancing the cause of economic and social justice. From his roots as an electrician in Local No. 24 to his rise through the ranks to president of Maryland's central labor body, Ed remained on the front lines. He walked the marbled halls of Annapolis lobbying top elected officials and he walked the streets of Baltimore joining his fellow union members on the picket line.

Ed's steadfast presence in Maryland politics will be missed. He dedicated his life to the labor movement and its causes. This meant time away from his family, his wife Joyce and their children Larry, Lisa, and Debbie. I know Ed's family can take pride in the career that he was able to forge with their support and the gains that the working people of Maryland were able to realize with his leadership.

I join with many others in Maryland to mourn the passing of a great leader in Maryland, Ed Lamon.

TRIBUTE TO ERNIE BLAKE

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Mr. Ernie Blake, a constituent of mine who died at the age of 75. Ernie Blake founded the Taos Ski Valley in 1954 and built it into a world renowned resort. He became known as the grand old man of New Mexico skiing for his contributions to the skiing industry.

Mr. Blake began skiing at the age of 4 while growing up near the Swiss ski resort of St. Moritz. At the age of 25 he traveled to New York where he read about the adventurous mountains of Colorado and began dreaming of building a European-style ski resort in the West. After World War II Blake managed the Santa Fe Ski Basin before focusing his attention on the jagged mountains of Taos. He fulfilled his dream in the 1950's, building one of the most challenging ski areas in the country.

Mr. Blake is recognized around the world for his contributions to skiing. In 1987 he was inducted into the U.S. Ski Hall of Fame in Michigan. The Federal Republic of Germany awarded him the Cross of the Order of Merit for his active support for German-American relations and for his involvement at the University of New Mexico's German Summer School in Taos. In 1972 Blake was elected chairman of the board of the Taos Ski Valley where he served until his death.

Mr. Blake was an extraordinary man who did more for New Mexico's ski industry than any other individual. His love for the Taos Ski Valley will be felt by generations to come. I send my condolences to his family and friends. He will be deeply missed.

TRIBUTE TO POTTERS SAVINGS AND LOAN CO.

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to pay tribute to one of the first and finest savings and loan institutions in this country, Potters Savings and Loan Co. in East Liverpool, OH. This month, Potters Savings and Loan celebrates the 100th anniversary of its charter, where, in 1889, Alwin Purinton, Sr. began to help the citizens of East Liverpool buy homes for their families. Alwin Purinton, passed his values along to his son, Alwin "Sandy" Purinton, Jr., long-time president of the company.

The history of this institution is very successful. Within 5 years of being chartered, Potters Savings and Loan Co. had already acquired two other thrift institutions. In 1902, the company bought their present main office site, building and opening the office by 1905. During the Depression this thrift faced hard times, as the rest of America did, but through excellent management and a strong reserve policy, every stockholder received his funds in full without a single loss. In the 1960's and 1970's, Potters S&L opened their annex building and the Calcutta and Glenmoor branches; and in 1982, they merged with First Federal Savings and Loan Co. of East Liverpool.

Today, Potters Savings and Loan Co. is a thriving institution, with 55 employees and assets of over $136,000,000; when they opened their head office in 1905 they had assets of $2,200,000. The encouragement of thrift and the promotion of home ownerships alway have been and will continue to be the company's main objectives.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating the Purinton family and Potters S&L on their centennial celebration and wishing them many more years of active participation in the growth of the home community and city of East Liverpool. At a time when there is a crisis of confidence in the savings and loan industry, Potter Savings and Loan Co. stands as an example of success and trust that other thrifts and banks can look toward.

SUPPORT OF RESOLUTION OPPOSING FUEL TAX INCREASE TO REDUCE DEFICIT (H.R. 41)

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, for the past 32 years, the revenues generated by the Federal motor fuel excise tax have been earmarked exclusively for the maintenance and improvement of our Nation's transportation infrastructure. This was not true when the fuel tax was first levied, and it reflects the progress that we have made toward an understanding of its consequences. In addition to directing resources to our Nation's transportation needs, the "user-fee" concept that has evolved responds to the inequities that result when the fuel tax is employed for more general purposes. A fuel tax increase targeted to reduce the deficit would repeat our past mistakes, requiring the poor, as well as residents of rural areas, to shoulder a disproportionate share of the deficit reduction burden.

The need for strong measures to address the budget deficit is indisputable. Our enormous revenue shortfall forces the Government to compete for the funds required by private industry to finance the growth of our economy, driving up its cost. A significant reduction of the deficit would allow interest rates to fall, thereby stimulating new investment in plant and equipment. By retarding capital investment, our huge deficit stifles improvements in the living standards of millions of Americans.

These benefits notwithstanding, economists warn of the harm that would result from the measure proposed. These experts are largely in agreement that the more substantial the increase in the motor fuel excise tax, the more severe the economic contraction that would follow. The best available estimates suggest that an increase of 25 cents per gallon would, in the first year of the levy, drain $30 billion from the economy and transfer it to the Government. This sum represents approximately 1 percent of the Nation's disposable personal income. Increased production costs would reduce profits in numerous industries, ultimately causing further loss of jobs and income. Investment in plant and equipment would also suffer, with negative implications for the future. In addition, higher gasoline prices would cause inflation to accelerate. Unless the resulting inflation was accommodated by the Federal Reserve, thus fueling further inflation, the result would be further economic contraction and additional decline in our Nation's living standards. Recognizing the severity of these consequences, the 97th Congress rejected a similar proposal in the face of sudden and alarming deficit growth that occurred in 1982.

Of perhaps even greater significance is the implication of the proposed tax increase for our Nation's already deteriorating transportation infrastructure. All States and many localities currently rely upon gasoline taxes, with most of the revenues generated earmarked for transportation-related expenses. Throughout this decade, increasingly cramped budgets have forced widespread reductions in the outlays by State and local governments for maintenance and improvement of these essential facilities. By discouraging the purchase of gasoline, a large increase in the motor fuel excise tax would substantially reduce the revenues available to States and localities for this purpose. While the deficit is indeed a dire concern, we cannot allow it to blind us to the deterioration of our Nations roads and mass transit systems. Indeed, the pressing need for repairs and improvements to our Nation's transportation infrastructure provides the sole justification for a modest increase in the motor fuel excise tax. The performance of needed repairs and improvements would stimulate economic growth, and would likely, have a favorable effect upon the budget deficit over the long term.

Economists further warn that the initial increase in revenues that a substantial increase in the motor fuel excise tax would generate would dissipate rapidly as consumers adjust their spending habits to include smaller gasoline budgets. By reducing our Nation's income, the measure proposed would at the same time cause lasting damage to our obligations in the future. These circumstances demand that we reject this potentially counterproductive "quick fix" in favor of a deficit reduction measure that maximizes the long-term well-being of our Nation's citizens.

THE NEXT WATER WAR: CITIES VERSUS AGRICULTURE

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

Monday, February 6, 1989

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, The following article by Marc Reisner, author of "Cadillac Desert," brings home a simple message: Our Western water policies and programs desperately need a reality check.

For nearly a century, taxpayers have been lavishing Western irrigators with elaborate pumping systems so we could make the desert bloom. But where a water project of the 1920's helped settle the West and stabilize the local economy, a water project of the 1980's is more likely to cost billions, encourage the growth of surplus crops, contaminate wildlife areas, and make it more difficult and expensive for urban areas to serve their citizens with clean drinking water.

Reisner's article contains fascinating statistics about water use in the West, and he suggests some creative ideas for fixing what's wrong with our water programs. I commend this article to my colleagues.

THE NEXT WATER WAR: CITIES VERSUS AGRICULTURE

(By Marc Reisner)

Like most Easterners, when I first came to California I was unprepared for the reality that it was so dry. On television and in the movies, the state had always looked lush and green. But as I drove across it, California—along with so much of the West—seemed far more arid than the mind's-eye image I had formed. It was a revelation to see just how much of this continent the desert owns.

Thus I supposed that the water problems of the West—with limited supplies of this precious resource stretched thin by burgeoning growth in population and industrial activity—were serious indeed. I was wrong. The fact is that the region has plenty of water for any rational need. Our problem is one of management. What we have in the American West is a stupefyingly inefficient—almost Soviet-style—system of water management and allocation. With relatively few adjustments—which may, I admit, require some real political courage to bring about—there would be plenty of water for further economic growth. And there would be water to repair some of the environmental damage that has already occurred—to bird habitats in the rivers and dried-up wetlands of the Pacific flyway, for example, and to estuarine treasures, such as San Francisco Bay, that produces so much aquatic life.

TAKING A LOT, RETURNING A LITTLE

To truly understand the use—and misuse—of water in the West, one must take a cold, detached look at agriculture.

In California, where I live, agriculture accounts for 85 percent of all water use, nearly all of it for irrigation; that figure is even higher in most other western states. But agriculture accounts for only 2.5 percent of the California economy. And, although the state economy has grown by $200 billion over the past 16 years (to $550 billion), agriculture's contribution has remained static at $14 billion.

Even in New Mexico, the least urbanized western state, agriculture returns just about 18 percent of the state's income—but uses 92 percent of the water.

What does all that water grow? In California, the number-one crop in terms of water consumption is irrigated pasture—grass and hay for cows and sheep—which used approximately 5.3 million acre-feet in 1986. This was equal to the amount of water consumed by all 27 million people in the state, and that includes swimming pools and watered lawns. And what was irrigated pasture worth to California? An invisible $94 million in gross receipts, representing about one five-thousandth of the economy. But it used one-seventh of the water on which that munificent economy depends.

Consider alfalfa, the second most water-consumptive crop. In 1986, irrigating alfalfa required as much water—3.9 million acre-feet—as metropolitan Los Angeles and the Bay Area combined. Drinking water, toilets, lawns, gardens, showers, swimming pools, car washes—everything. What did alfalfa return? About $630 million. Even when you add secondary benefits, alfalfa generated less economic activity than a few square blocks of downtown L.A.

Now we come to cotton, the third most water-consumptive crop. The San Joaquin Valley's million acres of cotton require around 3 million acre-feet of water per year. That's water for 15 million people—or 15 times the population of Nevada. In 1986, cotton added $842 million to the California economy. Better than alfalfa and grass, but still not much to brag about.

Rice is the fourth most water-consumptive crop in California. Rice, you could say, is not everyone's idea of an appropriate desert crop, since it grows only in manmade lakes. The main reason it is grown at all in California is because many of our rice farmers buy water from the Bureau of Reclamation at fabulously subsidized prices (as do many of the cotton, alfalfa, and hay farmers). But rice used much more water than the whole Bay Area in 1986—enough for 10 million people. Its gross value was a pitiful $204 million.

Suppose the cotton, alfalfa, pasture, and rice acreage in California was entirely eliminated? Suppose further that the land was not replanted with more sensible crops—truly a worst-case scenario, since you can grow practically anything in California. The agricultural industry would decline, from $14 billion to $12.3 billion a year in gross revenue, but there would instantly be enough water for 70 million more Californians . . . God forbid. That $1.7 billion loss of revenue, by the way, is exactly the cost of the proposed Auburn Dam that farmers want taxpayers to build for them. By simply retiring the land we'd get 75 times more water for our money.

USED IT OR LOSE IT

How has it come to this? How is it that in the western states—which are for the most part semiarid or arid, which have been experiencing tremendous population growth, and which have become dramatically more urbanized and industrialized since World War II—we allow a few extremely low-value forage and fodder crops to claim 50, 60, even 80 percent of the water?

There's no simple answer—is there ever a simple answer?—only a curious admixture of weather, confining legal doctrine, stubborn old habit, bureaucratic self-interest, socialist economics, and religion.

During the nineteenth century—when early western water rights were established—the American West was like a separate continent, isolated from the rest of the country by enormous distances, a primitive transportation system, and a ferocious and impetuous climate. Our forebears in the West felt an urgent need to be self-sufficient in food production. You couldn't easily import beef from Iowa or Texas, as you can today. So a lot of early and senior water rights were very large, based on the need to raise enormous forage acreage for cattle. The people who held these water rights—and who passed them on to their descendants—often formed irrigation districts that built canals and dams that are by now fully amortized. Therefore those who inherited these early water rights often owned a great volume of very inexpensive water.

When the Bureau of Reclamation came along in 1902, it offered cheap water to thousands of other farmers throughout the West, who were—and remain—exempted from paying interest on the taxpayers' investment in expensive aqueducts and dams. Imagine a $200,000 house, payable over 40 years with no interest charged at all. Your payments would be $416 a month instead of $1600 to $1800 a month. That is the order-of-magnitude savings the bureau's privileged farmer-clients enjoy.

In some locales, the bureau still sells water, legally or not—some think not—for less than half a cent per ton, literally cheaper than dirt. This is socialist water—it's hypocritical to call it anything else, even if it means undermining the image of the region's rugged-individualist yeoman farmer. When water costs $7.50 per acre-foot, it's cheaper to waste it than to conserve it. And we are talking here about one-third of the irrigation water currently used in the American West.

So here we have two reasons—one historic, the other economic—for low-value crops (and water waste and inefficiency) that fit hand-in-glove with a third reason: the doctrine of appropriative rights. This preeminent legal framework within which western water rights are acquired, held, and lost, can be boiled down to a fine essence of five words: Use it or lose it. Thus, if you were to shift from irrigated pasture to oranges, you could reduce your water consumption by two-thirds. In fact, you could substitute almost any crop for pasture and reduce your water consumption. But then, under appropriative rights doctrine, your neighbor could simply take the water you no longer use, unless you somehow arranged to sell it.

TOO MUCH FOOD

What about that prospect of selling it? In the case of water that has been developed and is sold by the Bureau of Reclamation—enough water, in theory, for the domestic uses of the entire population of the United States—I have seen almost no water rights being transferred or sold. Although the bureau has been talking about a "new mission," about "redefining its goals," it seems to me that its major goal remains to supply cheap water for as long as possible. I've spoken in person with the Commissioner of Reclamation and both Assistant Commissioners in recent months, and none of them said that the bureau is going to help its client farmers sell or rent water rights on a large scale—even if they want to. And the bureau has no plans to raise water rates substantially, even where projects are foundering in debt.

One reason is that if the Bureau of Reclamation gets into the business of redistributing water, or selling more expensive—which is to say, more realistically priced—water, it knows it will never have to build another dam. If I were an engineer—the Bureau of Reclamation is full of engineers—I would want to build more dams.

There's still another reason why so much western water is used on water-consumptive, low-value crops such as pasture and alfalfa. Outside of California, Arizona, and the Northwest, the region's bitter, high-altitude climate doesn't really let you grow much of anything else.

And yet even in California, where the most valuable crop, by far is grapes—California's grape industry is worth more than a billion and a half dollars per year, or 15 times the value of irrigated pasture—the grape acreage is barely half as large as the pasture acreage.

So why, even in mediterranean California, aren't we raising more grapes and fewer cows? Partly for the reasons mentioned above: If you have cheap water and a large water right, and western water law gives your neighbor any water you don't use, you might as well keep raising grass. To a western farmer, there is no terror like losing water rights. But another reason is this: The country doesn't need that much land to grow grapes. Or lettuce. Here we are in the age of the salad bar, and here is California growing the overwhelming share of the nations' lettuce, but this colossal lettuce crop needs just 168,000 acres. The avocado crop needs only 74,000 acres. The whole California lemon crop requires just 50,000 acres. With a relatively small amount of cropland devoted to it, California now grows a third of the table food in the United States.

It's not surprising, then, that I have to smile when someone accuses me of trying to doom us all to starvation by shifting water out of irrigation. The basic problem with U.S. agriculture is that we grow too much food! I have to smile, too, when some grower tells me that if the Bureau of Reclamation doubles or triples its water prices, then food prices will double or triple, too. That insults my intelligence. In California, we have farmers buying an acre-foot of federal water for $10 or $15, and other farmers buying State Water Project water for $50 an acre-foot, but they're both in business, and the one guy's tomatoes don't cost three times as much as the other's.

A SENSE OF CONQUEST

Let me add one last, speculative reason why I think water in the West seems to gravitate to the lowest rather than the highest economic uses. It's that water development, in my opinion, has long attained the status of a secular religion in the American West.

We say that we love the desert, those of us who live here. If that's true at all, it's only partially true. When you consider the passion and the money that we bring to the job of transforming the desert, you could easily conclude that we hate it. What we really want is a Miami (look at Beverly Hills) or an Illinois (look at the Sacramento Valley) where it doesn't rain. We may drive through the desert—in an air-conditioned car, of course—"experiencing" its grandeur. But we need to come home to a swimming pool and a big green lawn in the midst of that desert. We love to see those agricultural oases, those big swaths of green in the desert's vast austere emptiness. We tweak its majestic indifference by making it bloom.

And where we have rescued land from the desert's possession, we don't want to give it up. We don't want the desert to reclaim what we have stolen from it at such enormous effort and expense. Seeing the alfalfa fields growing around Reno, or crossing the Tehachapis and heading up the San Joaquin Valley and seeing that sudden explosion of green, gives us not just a sense of conquest—of accomplishment—but also a peace of mind. After all, when you come right down to it, the desert is the most frightening landscape on earth.

That peace of mind—the stability—offered by irrigated agriculture had great economic and social value a hundred years ago. It represented deliverance from the cyclical agonies of boom and bust. But local economies have markedly changed. Nevada, for example, had the good sense to cultivate the four most stable industries on earth: gambling, prostitution, marriage, and divorce. And the economic importance of recreation, retirement, and high technology throughout the region is vastly out of proportion to irrigated grass and alfalfa. But these crops enjoy a certain unordained priority, as if this were not the year 1989 but 1894.

In Colorado, the alfalfa crop uses 27 percent of the state's water and contributes a measly $160 million to the state's economy. Tourism takes a tiny fraction of that water but contributes $2 billion or $3 billion to Colorado's economy. Tourists prefer their water in roaring mountain streams, not on boring alfalfa fields. In California, the water in the South Fork of the American River is worth much more in the river than taken out for irrigation: The whitewater rafting business on the South Fork pumps several million dollars into Placer County's economy each year. Because there are no water development costs, that river represents pure profit. But the South Fork is scheduled to be dammed and diverted, because of that religious, uncompromising desire to keep the desert in bloom.

TOWARD MEANINGFUL CHANGE

Where does this leave us? Potentially with a war on our hands. True, the growers now own most of the water rights. But I don't know when westerners ever signed a Magna Carta proclaiming that agriculture has a God-given right to appropriate 85 to 90 percent of the region's water, for all time.

One day soon the urban voters of the West—who are the great majority today—are going to realize that agriculture—not Los Angeles, Las Vegas, or Phoenix—is the big environmental problem in the West, too. The blame for all the salmon rivers destroyed, the California wetlands acreage down to 5 percent of what it once was, millions of migratory waterfowl gone, the deer and elk and mountain sheep usurped from their traditional grazing lands, and the pesticides contaminating groundwater and Lake Mead and San Francisco Bay can't be laid at the cities' doors. And since something like 80 percent of all Californians and Nevadans now say they would side with nature in a contest with economic growth, this realization is going to count for a great deal when it finally hits home.

What people will someday realize, too, that they can have economic growth without ruining any more rivers and wetlands, and without building any more dams. They will start treating western water as the precious and scarce commodity that it is, and stop giving farmers oodles of subsidized water to grow subsidized crops.

What we have to do is disassemble the whole legal/legislative/procedural Rube Goldberg machine that distributes water in the West, and put it back together in a way that makes sense. Like Detroit in the 1970s, we are going to have to retool completely and build us a better car. Appropriative rights doctrine has got to be loosened up so that farmers have a financial incentive to conserve water. And laws that actually prohibit transfers of unused water rights must be revised. At present, transfers from the upper Colorado basin to the lower basin, between states, and even between designated water districts are often forbidden. It is illegal for Las Vegas to purchase Colorado basin water currently subject to such egregious waste as the growing of alfalfa in this region.

Now, the Bureau of Reclamation and spokespersons for the western irrigation lobby may tell you that rewriting the laws is impossible, or impractical, or politically unthinkable—as if every facet of western water law and regulation is chiseled in stone. Yet the irrigation lobby has succeeded in effecting wholesale revisions—repeatedly—in the most significant of all the federal laws governing water in the West: the Reclamation Act.

Originally, the farmers were supposed to repay the taxpayers' investment—minus interest—in 10 years. They amended that to 20. Then to 40. Then they added a 10-year "grace period," which made it effectively 50 years. Originally, you weren't supposed to receive subsidized water to irrigate more than 160 acres of land. Then the bureau was persuaded to interpret that as 320 acres—160 each for a man and wife. Then, in 1982, after a stellar lobbying campaign waged by the growers, the so-called Reclamation Reform Act upped the legal acreage to 960. Why is it possible to amend laws the irrigation lobby likes, but so impossible to amend laws it doesn't like?

I have no illusions that meaningful change will be easy. But I am convinced that it could be far less painful than most people believe.

Our first priority must be to protect the local economies that could be hurt by widespread sales of water rights—the farmers who remain, the seed and implement dealers, the local Dairy Queen. One could argue that in a free-market economy these people must simply take their knocks, but I don't subscribe to that view. In Colorado, where water rights are traded more freely than in any other western state, special state courts deal solely with the impacts of water transfers; any third party who feels he might be injured may seek compensation in court, and often receives it. Some say this system is too clumsy and expensive; if that's ture, let's invent a better one.

Of course, it's a proven fact that we could free up an enormous amount of water for economic growth without retiring any farmland at all. In west Texas, where the great Oglala Aquifer has been severely pumped out, conservation-mined farmers now use 40 percent less irrigation water than they did 10 years ago. They have installed low-head sprinkler systems, they laser-level their fields, they use sophisticated soil-moisture gauges so that hardly a drop of superfluous irrigation water is applied to their crops.

Why doesn't the city of Denver install such technology for those farmers who share the South Platte River with it—and then buy their conserved water—rather than spend $800 million on a white elephant like the proposed Two Forks Dam? The main reason is that in Colorado—as in most other western states—water rights usually may be traded only within designated water districts. Even if such a district abuts the city, Denver can't legally buy any of its water.

In a water-short region, this precious substance must be allowed to gravitate toward its highest economic uses—provided that potentially injured parties are protected. But there has been little thinking along these lines—least of all by state legislatures, where farm interests predominate. Our reflex response to a water shortage has always been to build another dam.

Everyone is afraid of initiating another water war, such as the famous conflict between the Owens Valley and the city of Los Angeles many years ago. But there needn't be any wars. A saner distribution, a more commonsensical allocation of water in the West can be worked out without dynamite and guns. But we had better hurry up and try, for in times of scarcity you do fight over the spoils. Much of the West has now lived through a year of severe drought; California has experienced two critically dry winters in a row. Have we forgotten that the Great Drought of the 1930s lasted nearly 8 years?

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of the meetings, when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in the meetings as they occur.

As an additional procedure along with the computerization of this information, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committee scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Tuesday, February 7, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

I will sing of thy steadfast love, O God, for ever; with my mouth I will proclaim thy faithfulness to all generations.

For thy steadfast love was established for ever, thy faithfulness is firm as the heavens.—Psalm 89:1, 2.

We offer our grateful thanks, O God, for Your faithfulness has been with us and all people through the ages. Even as we acknowledge Your gifts to Your whole creation, may we also seek to express a sense of faithfulness in our responsibilities as we seek to do the tasks given to us. Gracious God, may we and every person of our land express in thoughts, words, and actions the qualities of justice and mercy, so that those thoughts, words, and actions will contribute to the bond of trust and respect that we ought share as a united people. This we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Would the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] kindly lead the Members in the Pledge of Allegiance?

Mr. LEWIS of California led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Hallen, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the following resolution:

S. RES. 39

Resolved, That on a date designated by the Majority Leader in consultation with the Minority Leader, the Senate shall resume its consideration of the articles of impeachment against Judge Alcee L. Hastings for the purpose of hearing argument on a motion or motions by Judge Hastings to dismiss the articles.

(1) the briefs of the parties on any motion to dismiss the articles of impeachment; and

(2) material that would assist the Senate in the consideration of any such motion, including the articles of impeachment, Judge Hastings' answer to them, the replication of the House of Representatives, the provisions of the Constitution on impeachment, and the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate When Sitting on Impeachment Trials.

SEC. 4. The Secretary shall notify the House of Representatives and counsel for Judge Hastings of this resolution.

DISAPPROVING INCREASES IN EXECUTIVE, LEGISLATIVE, AND JUDICIAL SALARIES RECOMMENDED BY THE PRESIDENT

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 129) disapproving the increases in executive, legislative, and judicial salaries recommended by the President under section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.J. RES. 129

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress disapproves in their entirety the recommendations transmitted to the Congress by the President on January 9, 1989, under section 225(h) of the Federal Salary Act of 1967.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO]

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the joint resolution which I have at the desk is a resolution of disapproval of the President's pay recommendations made under the Quadrennial Commission procedure. Under section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967, as amended, the Congress has 30 days from the date of the official transmittal of these recommendations during which to agree to a joint resolution of disapproval. The 30-day period expires today, and so by action of the House, we take that action necessary to meet the requirement under the statute. The Senate, of course, must act today as well, and the President must sign the joint resolution in order to enact it into law.

To be sure it is effective, the President should sign it by midnight tonight.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a task that I enjoy in any sense. This resolution of disapproval reaches many fine officials and civil servants who desire a just and equitable raise; but this is a decision that was taken by the joint leadership after considerable consultation. It was neither an easy decision nor do I believe it is one that will have desirable consequences, but we face reality here today. We are doing what has become the inevitable.

Many senior officials in the Government deserve a salary comparable to the ones proposed by President Reagan. Certainly our Senior Executive Service does.

According to the report of the 1989 Commission on Executive, Legislative and Judicial Salaries, 2,498 positions in the Federal Government will be effected.

That number includes 834 members of the executive branch—this includes the Cabinet but mostly these are executive level 3, 4, and 5 jobs, such as the Deputy and Assistant Secretaries in the Cabinet departments, members of our regulatory bodies and directors and high level officials of both Cabinet and sub-Cabinet agencies.

There are 1,115 positions in the judicial branch who will not receive the raise proposed by the President—primarily the judges in the U.S. Court of Appeals and the U.S. District Courts.

There are also nine jobs in the legislative branch plus the Members of Congress.

Indirectly, Mr. Speaker, another 10,074 positions will not receive an increase in their salary ceilings because of the resolution. These are jobs such as the Senior Executive Service—7,114 of them—and the Senior Foreign Service—1,256 positions—who have their salaries linked to the executive level salaries which are set under the Quadrennial Commission procedure.

In addition to the Senior Executive Service and the Senior Foreign Service, 1,044 members of the executive branch in the so-called supergrade jobs are frozen—GS-16, GS-17, and GS-18; 640 staff positions in the judicial branch and 20 legislative branch positions. There are 155 generals and admirals in the military who are also affected.

While these positions are affected only indirectly, those salaries would have gone up automatically under the procedure.

Where in the future are we to get and hold on to the necessary expertise at the National Institutes of Health to advance the research on AIDS, heart disease and cancer, and the other health issues important to our society?

How do we hold on to the experts in space technology, defense procurement, toxic waste disposal, and other areas where industry and the universities are hiring our best people out of Government service when they reach their peak, when they are at their most productive period of life.

How will we hold on to our Federal judges, who must deal daily across the bench with lawyers who make 5 and 10 times the salaries we pay our own Federal judiciary?

There are Supreme Court Justices making less than their clerks the day after they finish their clerkships and go into the private sector. There are Federal judges whose former law firms are paying people who work for those firms two and three times more than they with minimal time in service.

There are people turning down judicial appointments every day simply because they cannot make the sacrifices that are demanded of their families. So we all suffer as a result.

I have heard people say that there are long lines for prestigious jobs out there, no shortage of people in the country willing to pay the price of public service. But I fear those who are saying that do not understand that the American people need the very best we can get to do the business of our Government. We need a compensation policy to attract the best, not one that will just produce long lines at the job application window.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say something very firmly. This is not the end of the discussion of this issue. In some ways, it may be the beginning of a new effort.

This Congress cannot long ignore the increasing call for ethical reform within this body. We all know that Members of the House and the Senate will continue to depend on honoraria income as part of our personal budgets and that that essentially is not available to people in the executive and judicial branches.

Without this raise Congress will be in fact what one of our major critics, Ralph Nader, fears it would be with the raise, and that I believe is a body increasingly made up of relatively wealthy people who do not constitute a fair cross section of the American people.

We are going to find that people who are very well off will continue to retire to Congress later in life while other struggling younger Members in some cases may continue to be tempted to live on the ethical margin.

We truly face a national crisis in this area in all three branches of Government.

To make progress we need several things. First of all, to increase the bipartisan comity that must exist in this body and in Congress generally if we are to answer these questions successfully. Hopefully the bipartisan task forces on ethics and campaign reform which have been appointed by the Speaker and the minority leader will continue to delve into these areas; but if we are to have any success when we ultimately come to the floor with solutions to these problems, we are going to need more self-respect for ourselves and respect for the institution.

We are going to need to show some courage individually. We no longer are going to be in a position to hand this problem to some process or some person and assume it will be taken care of for us. We are going to have to venture something of ourselves if we are going to make any progress.

We are not going to be able to allow those among us who are candidates for Governor or Senator to demagog this issue at the expense of all the Members. We are not going to be able to allow the wealthy among us who really have nothing to gain from a pay raise like this to put the rest of us at a disadvantage, to burden us with arguments centered around the charge of greed.

Most of us, frankly, have not had the courage to speak out. We have not taken the opportunity to rebut those charges that have been made so carelessly in the media.

And the media in general did a very poor job. They provided, in some cases, biased coverage. We became cartoon cannon fodder for trash television and for talk radio, but we did not make our own case, even though we had more editorial and public interest support, including Common Cause, than we have ever had before. We fell prey to the deception of the rabble rousers.

Mr. Speaker, as we look to the future, we need more bipartisan courage, the kind of courage that President Bush showed when he spoke out in favor of this raise, the kind that guided our legislative leaders here in the House until the last few days. We need to follow a game plan, not one of 435 different approaches that each individual Member would prescribe to meet his own particular problems.

We can do it if we have the courage to try. If we fail, it will be our fault, and no one else's.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, first, let me say to the body that in these very difficult matters that relate to the legislative branch it, indeed, has been a pleasure to work with my professional chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO]. He is always willing to communicate on a two-way basis regarding the toughest of issues.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution of disapproval of the pay raise recommended by the Quadrennial Commission.

Let me say that those who have reviewed the Congress for years know that we are elected to make the tough choices. Congress is the decision point for public policy of the highest importance to our citizens.

How much money should be spent for national defense?

How do we meet the challenge of a national health crisis such as AIDS?

What should be our future role in space?

What should be the road to maintaining peace in a nuclear age?

If the Congress is to meet the challenges of these questions effectively, Congress must be made up of the most talented in our society. In order to attract the best and brightest, it is obvious that over time the Congress will have to pay salaries at a level that will command the service of the most qualified.

As the Quadrennial Commission presented its recommendation of $135,000 to the President this year, their recommendation, to say the least, raised a good deal of controversy within our society.

I found it fascinating to note that many of those who were most vocal in opposing this recommendation were those in our society who themselves make much more. For example, Ralph Nader, a single man, 45 years of age, no children, no requirements for a second home, accepts as much as $10,000 a speech and has reported to have made 40 such speaking engagements last year. Yet, he opposes the pay raise, Commentators and members of the press who range from $300,000 to maybe $3 million a year oppose the pay raise.

Members of the other body who most publicly opposed the raise are themselves of millionaire status.

Entertainers and athletes—the best in their business—earn at the multimillion dollar level.

So the public must ask itself over time—do we want to pay enough to attract the best to public affairs?

Clearly the public is not ready yet. Thus we have before us a bill to rescind a proposed 51-percent pay raise for Congress. I stand here today in support of that resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I have never in my career seen a legislative body that was anything but clumsy in dealing with questions of pay. It is obvious that when a body such as this has to vote on its own pay, it is put in a most difficult position. As a result, over time Congress has allowed its own pay to erode.

Mr. Speaker, since 1968, if we took the then level of pay of Congress and simply adjusted it yearly for cost of living, the current pay, according to schedules, would be $137,500. Recognizing the difficulty that a body like this has, an independent Commission was created to review comparable pay for high levels of the executive branch, for the judiciary as well as for Congress. That Commission, after taking endless testimony in public hearing, and reviewing comparable private sector jobs made a recommendation for a salary level of $135,000.

Mr. Speaker, the process established goes like this: Following such a recommendation, the President reviews the proposal. If the President believes it appropriate he could reduce the amount recommended. In this case, President Reagan approved the recommendation of $135,000. President-elect Bush expressed his public support for that level of pay. Then the recommendation was submitted to the Congress.

Both Houses of Congress then have 30 days in which to disapprove the proposal.

Indeed, in this case a public furor developed. As a result of that, directly, there is little doubt that the recommendation of the Quadrennial Commission will be turned down.

Mr. Speaker, today we in Congress, will be reflecting the voice of the people.

I urge my colleagues to support the rescission of this pay raise.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] has 13 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] has 14 minutes remaining.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the joint resolution under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COELHO], the majority whip.

Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, Barbara Tuchman died yesterday.

Had she lived another 24 hours, I suspect she'd be recording our actions in a new edition of the "March of Folly."

We are engaged in an action that is surely self-defeating and hazardous to our national prospects long term.

We are voting for business as usual.

We are voting for a system of compensation that pivots around special interest money and withers before the cost of living.

We are voting to continue the exodus of judges, top-level managers, and, yes, creative Members of Congress from Government service to the private sector.

We are voting to delay critical work on AIDS, space exploration, high definition television, or an effective trade policy.

We are by approving this resolution expressing a peculiar nostalgia for the anti-Government philosophy of Ronald Reagan in a new era of activist Government heralded by George Bush.

"The maxim of the British people," said Winston Churchill at Guildhall, "is business as usual." Now it is ours.

There are some who will portray our actions here as a triumph of the will of the people. This is no victory; it is a loss for the concept of leadership.

We must not get into the habit of sacrificing the merits on the altar of popular passions.

What will happen the next time—

When we need to ask the American people for revenues to stop our deficit or, yes, to spend money for education or to clean up nuclear bomb wastes leaking into our soil, our water and our homes?

What will happen the next time—

When to restore our energy independence or to tackle global warming we have to ask for more nuclear power, an import fee on foreign oil, or stringent conservation measures?

What will happen the next time—

When, to restore our competitiveness, we have to delay some material gratifications today in order to secure prosperity tommorrow?

What's the answer? Government by tea bag? Don't worry. Be happy?

This vote is the political equivalent of walking past a hundred dollar bill on the floor of the bus station. The temptation to bend down and pick it up cannot be resisted.

For many of us, the right vote is to kill the raise—simply because the process is utterly broken and the numbers are stacked against us.

It is hard to make the argument that doing the right thing means voting yourself a raise—that's why, procedurally, this built-in conflict of interest must be discarded permanently.

But no one should walk away from this debate satisfied with the outcome as to our own pay or what this means for our ability to make tough decisions later on.

The score is easy to read: Ralph Nader "1," national interest "0." The folly is upon us. Let the march begin.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. STEARNS].

Mr. STEARNS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] for this distinct opportunity and yielding me this time.

I am pleased to offer this short comment on this important subject. In all due respect to my fellow colleagues, both senior and freshman Congressmen, we are here today because the citizens have voiced their concern, and we must listen to them.

But I wish to say as a freshman Congressman let us not detract from this august and preeminent body of the world in our debate. Let us not demean this great House. Let us go forward with the idea that we will solve the problems of America, the deficit and other problems, and show the citizens of this country that we deserve any future raises.

Let us go forth and speak highly of this House.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, today I held a hearing with the appeals courts and the district courts of the Federal judiciary. They tell me that in their survey, 215 out of some 700 Federal judges have indicated that they will not stay with the Federal court very long unless there is an adjustment in pay.

We do not permit the judges to speak for honoraria payments, or take money from parties that may be before them. Only Members of Congress may do that and I think that needs to be prohibited. We must reform such practices in this House and in the Senate.

Everyone understood, we were to execute a two-step plan to get there. We would end up with the same number of dollars and there would not be an increase in pay. We were to end up at the same total number of dollars between honoraria and salary, but it would all be salary and none from payments arranged by lobbyists.

A lot of Members think defeating the pay raise first will assure defeat of the reforms and it goes a long way toward doing just that. Many Members want to end up with their honoraria just like they now have but that issue does not and should not go away. These honoraria payments that are arranged by lobbyists must stop. That is deservedly a bad reflection on this House. We cannot have an independent House when a majority of the Members take those kinds of payments as a substitute for cost-of-living adjustments. We must stop it.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. INHOFE].

Mr. INHOFE. Mr. Speaker, today we are experiencing the second part of a three-part reform that we are undergoing. I think yesterday probably was the most significant one because what we did yesterday was open the door of Government and let Members stand accountable for their acts.

Today the pay raise will go down in defeat. I will oppose it. I encourage all of my colleagues to oppose it. But we know it is going down in defeat.

The most significant thing, however, should be what happens tomorrow. There are bills that are in. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. TOM TAUKE, has one. Many other Members have bills to reform the system, to require recorded votes so we can go back and sell ourselves to the people in our districts based on the job that we are doing.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] is correct. We need to discuss honoraria. I for one will oppose any increase in salary that does not have a compensating decrease in honoraria.

So I think the second part of our reform will take place today and the most significant part will come in the future.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PEASE].

Mr: PEASE. Mr. Speaker, I, like most of my colleagues, will vote to reject the pay raise proposal of the Quadrennial Commission.

I want, however, to express my great regret that Congress will today deny salary increases to Federal judges and high-level Federal administrators. It is a serious mistake of public policy for Congress to insist that judges and Federal executives be kept in the same boat as Members of Congress.

The truth is that the Federal Government faces direct competition with the private sector in recruiting and retaining top quality lawyers on the Federal bench and experienced and able executives for Cabinet-level positions and for a range of positions at the sub-Cabinet level. Better salaries are strongly needed if the Federal Government is to successfully recruit good judges and administrators and to treat fairly those who are already on the Federal payroll.

In the future I hope we will be wiser than we are being today in not separating the question of Member of Congress increases from those of judges and Federal executives.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, today the will of the people has prevailed. Our unique form of American democracy is safe. The Founding Fathers can rest easy, the voices of the people have not been muffled, the union is safe.

There was never any doubt how the citizens of this Nation felt. Millions of us were opposed to this dishonest pay increase from the very beginning. It is and always has been dirty money. Allowing this absurd increase to go into effect without a vote would have constituted an ethical atrocity that this body would never have been able to live down.

It would have flown in the face of the very essence of our national being: A nation for the people, by the people, and of the people. But today we do vote. We have listened to our people and done what needed to be done. We have set aside the self-satisfying desire to astronomically increase our own salary. We have sent a message to the people of this great Nation that the system does work, and we have set the example of fiscal integrity and restraint that this Nation needs.

Now I recommend we remain true to our principles and go one step further. We all agreed, during the debate on this raise, that honorarium is wrong. Well I submit to you that if honoraria is unethical, if it is wrong, if it is bad, then it needs to be banished with or without the pay increase. I urge my colleagues to join with me in seeing to it that honorarium is banned permanently and immediately.

I call on my friends and colleagues in the Senate to not delay, and to swiftly concur with this honorable action to abolish the proposed salary increase.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EARLY].

Mr. EARLY. Mr. Speaker, when the Commission made its recommendations I immediately contacted the press and told them that I would support the $135,000 pay level. In the past week, I have had numerous calls to my office. The respected local newspaper, which is the major newspaper in my town, has editorialized against the pay raise.

□ 1230

I look at this vote today as a responsibility of the position. As Members of Congress we control billions and hundreds of billions of dollars of spending. It is this body which strives to keep the United States out of war, and we must also spend billions of dollars to make sure if there is a conflict that we are ready for the conflict.

I think back a few short years ago when this House voted to send the United States Marines to Lebanon. Two hundred and sixty-four marines died, two from my district, because of the bad judgment of this body.

The responsibility of this position is awesome. I only have 2 minutes, but let us look at the Federal judges. It is easy to be critical of them. Today you can read where law school graduates from Ivy League schools can start at $70,000 in New York City the day they pass the bar.

Quality justice demands we appoint the most qualified people and we keep the best. Very few, if any, Federal judges could not leave the bench and get a considerable pay increase.

The media says today that there is no shortage in the line for the Federal bench. That is true. Our concern should be who is in line. We need the best.

Chairman SMITH spoke about the judges, about the judges who would leave. That is not a threat, ladies and gentlemen. Here is a survey of 133 judges that are on the Federal bench over 15 years, 92 of whom would leave if their salary is not increased. Of 83 who have been on the bench 11 to 15 years, of that number 68 will leave and 15 will stay if there is not a pay raise.

Look at this pay raise, and I say this ladies and gentlemen: Reelection is more important in this House than anything else. I am concerned with the numerous constituents who have called and expressed their opinions. I deeply respect their opinions, and I am concerned with what they say. However, in this case, I disagree with them. I say responsibility is what is in the long-range good of government. Concern for the long-term good is more responsible than that for reelection.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TAUKE].

Mr. TAUKE. Mr. Speaker, this is a difficult time for all Members of the House of Representatives and it has been a tough time for this institution. But I think there are some lessons we should take from this as we move forward to address this issue in the future.

First, any issue relating to pay raise must contain with it accountability. We make a mistake if we try to avoid accountability on this question.

Second, we cannot separate this issue from the dominant issue of our time which is the Federal deficit. Clearly, one of the reasons that this pay raise is going down is because of the understanding that if it had been approved we would have disabled ourselves in the battle against the deficit.

Finally, this issue is not over. We know it is going to be back for the reasons that have been articulated by many Members relating to judges, relating to the ethical issues surrounding this House of Representatives, relating to the service of people in high levels of Government. But I hope that as we address it again in the future we can do it in a way which assures accountability and at the same time recognizes our unique role as public servants with responsibility for leading the charge against the deficit.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER.]

Mr. DANNEMEYER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the Speaker for bringing this resolution to the floor. It was the right thing to do and I thank him for it.

Shortly we will vote on it. I want to share with my colleagues something that might come as a shock to them: This Member is prepared to vote to adjust our compensation at $135,000 a year right now, provided, prior to that time we propose to the States a constitutional amendment on a balanced budget by a vote of not less than 290 votes. The form of that should take what a bipartisan effort tried last year, in a discharge petition—CHARLES STENHOLM of Texas and LARRY CRAIG of Idaho worked that up—that is the form it should take.

The rationale is simple. The biggest problem in adjusting our compensation with the American public is the mess we have made of the fiscal affairs of this Nation. We are working on adding the third trillion in the national debt; we are going to add a quarter of a trillion this year and I think we go a long ways toward redeeming ourselves of our irresponsibility by doing what 75 percent of the American public want, Democrat, Republican, Independent, have a proposed constitutional amendment on a balanced budget.

What an easy way to get this increase.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution and I urge my colleagues to join me in striking down the recommendations of the Quadrennial Commission.

This Commission, started in 1967, clearly has outlived its usefulness. What can we expect from any commission which only meets once every 4 years? How can we expect them to keep up with the need to review Federal compensation if they are continually playing catch up? What really should surprise us is that the recommendations weren't even more outrageous than the 51 percent that the Commission finally determined.

The time has come for us to recognize that the American public is tired of seeing Federal pay rise beyond all comprehension and without this Congress going on the record to approve or to disapprove the increases. We told our constituents that we could do great things last November when we ran for re-election. Until yesterday, many cynical people doubted that Congress would have the courage to reject the Commission's recommendations. Well Mr. Speaker, our presence here today proves that this body can act responsibly and we can respond to the wishes of the overwhelming majority of our constituents.

The time has come to abolish the Quadrennial Commission and return the responsibility for setting Federal compensation to Congress where the process can occur on a regular basis, in full view of the American public, without the mystery of some nebulous commission, and, most importantly, with an affirmative vote of approval by this body. I intend to introduce legislation to accomplish this so we can avoid any further events like those of the past few months.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, it is quite apparent to me that both the media and a great many of my colleagues ruefully have missed the point in this protracted and misleading debate on the issue of the pay raise recommended by former President Reagan shortly before he left office.

The whole focus of the controversy revolved erroneously around Members of Congress while the very structure of our Federal Government is crumbling because we no longer are able to attract the best and the brightest among us to fight the battles against such public enemies as AIDS, cancer, crime, drugs, illiteracy, pollution and a myriad of other ills that beset our society.

The entire pay raise would have covered only 12,000 people in the other two branches of Government. It is indeed unfortunate that they get hurt because some Members of Congress could not resist an opportunity to demagog the pay raise for their own political purposes. I would like to point that an overwhelming majority of the 12,000 people affected are Republicans. This clearly was not a raise for Democrats.

The shame is that all these others are denied the raise needed to keep them in the Federal service.

I think the time has come to consider delinking Congress from the executive and the judicial branches lest we do terrible damage to the Federal service.

What was lost in the swirling controversy that inaccurately centered on Congress was the fact that we no longer can attract the kind of people we need to run the space program, guarantee that our food and drugs are safe, lead critical research programs at the National Institutes of Health or ensure our national defense.

I believe it would be well to recall what President Reagan said when he proposed the pay raise in his last budget. I would like to include in the RECORD his letter to me on January 6 of this year.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC, January 6, 1989.

Hon. WILLIAM D. FORD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: On January 9, 1989, I will be forwarding to the Congress the compensation recommendations of the Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries. This bipartisan Commission composed of individuals of superior achievement in the public and private sectors carefully reviewed the compensation of senior Federal officials and unanimously recommended increased levels of compensation.

Fair compensation for those who bear the responsibility for effective functioning of our government is critical at this juncture of history. The American people expect excellence at the top levels of government, and they deserve to get it. But our Founding Fathers also envisioned a citizen government whose members are drawn from all parts of our society.

We must not allow Federal service to become the province only of the wealthy. We must ensure that the door to service remains open to Americans who must work to support their families, educate their children, and save for their retirement. As it now stands, government service for any significant length of time presents a financial burden that fewer and fewer of those who are most highly qualified can afford to accept.

Since 1969, salary levels for senior Federal officials—executives, legislators, and judges—have declined 35% in constant dollars, while the compensation of workers in the private sector has kept pace with inflation. To remedy this situation, the Commission has recommended salary levels for senior government positions that are comparable to those earned by individuals of similar responsibilities in the nonprofit private sector, such as universities and hospitals. The Commission's recommendations would only bring these Federal salaries to a level approaching that of their 1969 purchasing power. In fact, the salary paid to a Member of Congress in 1969, if increased solely to match the inflation that has occurred since then, would amount to $140,340—more than the Commission recommended. It is important to note that the cost of implementing the Commission's pay recommendations would be absorbed within the fiscal year 1990 budget—it would not add to the deficit.

I join the Commission in urging Congress to abolish the current system used to supplement inadequate Federal salaries through payments from private special interests. The ban on honoraria should take effect at the same time as the proposed pay levels take effect. The current system undermines public faith in the integrity of senior Federal officials, particularly in the Legislative branch. Congress should move immediately to enact legislation that takes a comprehensive approach to the problems posed by honoraria, including payments for articles, speeches, and appearances, and other forms of financial benefits.

During my Presidency, I have been impressed with the ability and dedication of the senior Federal officials who serve our country. It is in the Nation's best interest to attract and keep highly qualified individuals for senior government positions. I ask you to support the bipartisan Commission's unanimous pay recommendations to ensure that the American people continue to benefit from the government service of highly talented Americans.

Sincerely,

RONALD REAGAN.

Anyone who feels that highly competent people are lining up at the doors of Government for important jobs because they pay well, because benefits are high, or because of an enviable Federal pension, are sadly behind the times.

This is our problem. Not whether Members of Congress deserve or do not deserve a pay raise.

Among those who truly know about such matters, it is clear that America is facing a brain drain from Federal service of unprecedented magnitudes. As chairman of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service for the past 8 years, I have had a rare opportunity to hear first hand the plight of our Federal career service.

And I shudder to think what is ahead as we continue down the same road.

For years now we have seen the United States fall behind in science, manufacturing, and in a number of other important areas. And unless we find some way to stop this trend we are guaranteeing that America will become a second-rate nation unable to compete with the rest of the world in a high-technology 21st century, unable to vie in the quest for space, and unable to deal with the very basic issues of health and welfare.

When he testified before the President's Quadrennial Commission last fall, Dr. Anthony Fauci, former head of the National Cancer Institute, and now head of the National Institutes of Health [NIH], said that NIH has not been able to recruit a single research scientist from the private or academic sectors to conduct clinical or basic biomedical research in the last 10 years.

Mr. Speaker, in testimony before my committee I have heard such terrifying stories time and time again.

As a result, it has become clear to me that by refusing to adequately compensate top Federal employees, we surely are driving the best people from Government and ensuring that we can only replace them with those who cannot succeed in the private sector.

Let's look for a moment at the judiciary. The Judicial Conference of the United States reports that in the 15 years from 1958 to 1973, only six judges resigned from the Federal bench. But in the 15 years from 1974 to 1988, there have been 57 resignations.

Extensive interviews with those who decided to hang up their judicial robes cite financial considerations as a principal factor in decisions to resign. The truth is that we are paying our Federal judges less than the salary earned by first-year graduates of top law schools. How much sense does that make, I ask you?

If we look into another area we find that nearly a quarter of the winners of the Presidential Rank Award for Distinguished Executive Service have left the Federal Government—80 percent of them for higher pay in the private sector.

This is the sorry story that we find across the Federal service.

Unfortunately, the critics fail to see what is happening at the top of the Federal work force. They see a rosy situation where senior Federal managers, judges and other officials are happy with their financial lot and work merrily toward a fat Federal retirement, while enjoying a lot of perks not available in the private sector.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the world seen by these critics is one that does not exist.

The real world is the one of Dr. Fauci at NIH, the Federal judges who have called it quits, the top managers who have cried "enough" and those managers, scientists and planners who find they have no choice but to leave Government service for the sake of their children's education and the welfare of their families. No, Mr. Speaker; the Federal Government is not providing a work and retirement haven for some kind of privileged class. The Federal Government instead is suffering severely from an exodus of our best and brightest—those who will make the difference between a healthy, successful and secure America—because the private sector thinks more of them than does their own Government.

We had better wake up soon. And we had better understand the real problem before us, rather than the one created by misguided do-gooders who, in the end, will only doom our country to mediocrity.

I would like to insert in the record for the edification of our colleagues articles by Elliot Richardson and Robert H. Bork, as well as editorial comments in today's New York Times by Tom Wicker and Nelson W. Polsby.

MEDIOCRITY WILL NOT SUFFICE

(By Elliot Richardson)

My Massachusetts friends know me primarily as a politician and a bureaucrat. Given the reaction to the proposed federal pay raise, I wonder how much of their money they thought I would be worth if I held office now. As attorney general of the United States, half as much as a junior partner in a Wall Street firm? As ambassador to Great Britain, one-quarter as much as a tight end for the Patriots? As secretary of defense, one-eighth as much as the senior vice president of a major defense contractor?

The pay increases proposed by Ronald Reagan on the recommendation of the Cutler Commission would bring government salaries up to these levels. Without the increase, the attorney general will continue to get one-third of the junior partner's compensation, the ambassador one-fifth of a lineman's, and the defense secretary one-tenth of the defense executive's. If the polls are correct, most people would say: What's wrong with that? Government salaries aren't supposed to keep pace with those in the private sector.

Although this is the prevailing point of view, I am not sure why. The best explanation seems to be: Public service doesn't produce profits, so you can't measure its value. It's sort of like teaching or the ministry: people who enjoy the satisfaction of doing good don't need a financial incentive. Anyway, it's our money they're being paid. Besides, we don't need to attract very able people into public jobs. Mediocrity will suffice.

The explanation ends off track. Donald Atwood, vice chairman of General Motors, is about to become deputy secretary of defense—a considerably more difficult and important job than the one he is leaving. The same could be said of President Bush's other top-level appointees, including undersecretaries and assistant secretaries, all of whom will be facing daunting challenges.

No one argues that government salaries should match those in the private sector—if they did, many public officials would be paid more than their nongovernmental counterparts. However, in the last 20 years the purchasing power of corporate executives' pay nearly doubled while that of government executives has been cut by a third. The salaries paid by nonprofit institutions have also risen well above government salaries. This has made it increasingly difficult for the federal government to recruit and retain people able enough to fill the demanding responsibilities of hundreds of senior positions.

The same erosion of salaries has hit the judiciary particularly hard. An indicator is the number of resignations from the bench. Only six judges resigned between 1958 and 1973; in the comparable span from 1974 to this year, the number was 57.

Of course, the pay raise won't go just to judges and top-level officials in the executive branch. Members of Congress would also get it. This accounts for much of the opposition. It's easy to complain about Congress. Members of Congress are—or have to seem to be—"just folks." Why should they be paid more than most of the people they represent? The plain and simple answer is that they work longer hours under more pressure, take more abuse, sacrifice more privacy and have to deal with a far wider range of problems.

We need the best and brightest people we can get in the House and Senate. In an increasingly complex, interdependent, competitive world, their jobs are tougher than ever. Pegged at the same level as judges and deputy Cabinet secretaries, their salaries have suffered the same erosion in purchasing power, and they have to maintain homes both in Washington and in their districts. As an offset to the pay increase, they will be required to give up honoraria from outside groups.

As President Bush said last week, "The increases are overdue." Unless something is done, we're going to continue to slide closer and closer to the point where only the wealthy can afford public service. It would be nice if the members of Congress had the political courage to face up to the pay issue directly, but that's too much to expect. Better to have it handled by an automatic device that can be blocked only by a negative vote in both branches than let it be defeated by demagoguery and cowardice.

MISERABLE WAGES, MISERABLE LEADERS

(By Robert H. Bork)

WASHINGTON.—The tidal wave of venom that threatens to sweep away the proposal to raise the salaries of Federal officials is flabbergasting. Who would have thought that so many Americans who love incumbent Congressmen so dearly as to award them something resembling life tenure simultaneously hate them so much that they would require them, along with Federal executives and judges, to serve at inadequate and steadily decreasing real compensation? Yet people are responding to the populists of the left and right who have exploded with fury at the Quadrennial Commission's proposal.

That reaction is shortsighted and self-defeating. If you don't like our present Federal officials, you are going to loathe the ones that will be produced by salary levels that are continually eroded by inflation over the next 10 or 15 years.

We have made the same kind of mistake before. Many people once answered "yes" to the question, "Would you rather pay less than the market price for natural gas?"

That affirmative answer brought a drastic shortage of natural gas. Today, many people may be ready to answer "yes" to the question, "Would you rather pay less than the market price for qualified representatives and judges?" despite the fact that the result will be identical—a shortage of competent officials.

Ralph Nader, whose demagogic skills easily outrun his respect for the laws of economics, was among those who advocated a below-market price for natural gas. Now, Mr. Nader is mounting an enormous campaign to insure that the real wages of Government officials are not restored but will continue to be eaten away by inflation.

Political parties are having trouble recruiting good candidates for Congress, and part of the reason most certainly is pay. While salaries in the past 20 years have fallen 30 or 40 percent behind inflation, the price of housing in and around Washington has skyrocketed far past the rate of inflation.

This is also true in many major metropolitan areas. The result is increasing difficulty in recruiting and retaining qualified Federal judges. Many excellent lawyers simply will not consider the Federal bench as a career and many excellent judges are thinking seriously of giving up that career.

There is, for some unfathomable reason, a feeling that judges as elected or appointed officials should earn little more than the average American. Mr. Nader sounds this theme. But our society is built on the income differentials necessary to attract talent where it is wanted. Certainly, much of the compensation for Government service is psychic. But even with the recommended pay raise, most Congressmen and judges will have living standards well below those they would enjoy in other occupations, and psychic income does not buy a house in Washington or send the children told college.

One of my clerks, after an additional year as a Supreme Court clerk, joined a New York law firm with a bonus that put her first year compensation well ahead of mine as a Court of Appeals judge.

District Court judges and Congressmen now make $89,500 a year. When law professors make much more, when youngsters two, three or four years out of law school make more, and can widen the gap with every year they practice, who will want a career on the Federal bench? Who will seek a career in Congress? The answers are obvious: the independently wealthy, the financially unsuccessful those who intend to stay only for a few years in order to dress up their resumes or, perhaps the most disturbing thought of all, those who crave power.

There is no respectable reason to oppose spending the small amounts it would take to compensate officials adequately. This is especially true when the proposal would ban the "honorariums" that raise serious ethical questions for Congressmen. At a $135,000 salary in Washington, New York, Chicago or Los Angeles, no judge or legislator is about to become a maharaja. We have indexed retirement benefits, tax rates and much else to the rate of inflation; it makes no sense to object to similar treatment for Federal salaries.

It is expected that President Reagan will approve the increase. If Congress does not allow the raise to go through, it will not be easier next time. Sooner or later, Congress must summon the courage to make public service a reasonably attractive calling.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 7, 1989]

DEMOCRACY AT ITS WORST

(By Tom Wicker)

When Jimmy Carter was campaigning for President in 1976, he frequently said that the country needed "a government as good as the people." Sometimes, however, the people are the problem, as demonstrated once again by their fury over a necessary and justified salary rise proposed for members of Congress and other Federal officials.

That misplaced outrage has doomed the pay increase. Under pressure from the public, Speaker Jim Wright first announced a vote on cutting it from 50 to 30 percent. Under even heavier pressure, he now has knuckled under completely and scheduled a roll-call vote on the increase itself. That all but certainly will kill it, since most members of the House consider it political suicide to vote to raise their own pay.

Congress deserves some of the public contempt in which it's held, and it's true that a 50 percent increase is more than most Americans ever can expect from their employers. It might well have been wiser to schedule, say, three 15 percent rises over five or six years.

But members of Congress would have had to forgo, in return for the pay rise, the substantial honorariums they now are permitted to accept. They are paid considerably less than their responsibilities ought to command. A stretched-out plan would have prolonged the serious financial problems, including the maintenance of two residencies, that some have; and it might well have caused something like the current furor three times instead of once.

The public outcry, moreover, was not really about the size of the pay increase; more than half of those sampled in a Gallup Poll did not even know how much members of Congress now are paid. Had the proposed raise been only 10 or 20 percent, the opposition probably would not have been much less vociferous; indeed, the uproar was not stilled by Speaker Wright's proposal to scale back the increase.

That's because it was based fundamentally on the low esteem in which government, especially Congress, is held by the American people—few of whom in their traditional disdain for politicians think any increase, or even the current pay level, is warranted. Their opposition was sharpened, of course, by the roundabout way in which the pay increase was supposed to take effect—on the recommendation of a special commission, without Congress having to approve or defeat the proposal in an on-the-record vote.

The irony is that a major purpose of the pay increase was to attract better people to the public service, and to make it easier for them to stay there against the lure of better-paying jobs in the private sector—hence increasing, in theory, the public's regard for members of Congress and Federal officials. And the reason Congress didn't want to vote on the matter, and shouldn't have to, is that ingrained public opposition to Congressional pay increases of any size, at any time, makes it politically impossible for most members to vote to increase their own salaries.

Thus, the public was infuriated by a proposal aimed at improving a body the same public now holds in contempt. And that same public denounced a "sneaky" process made necessary by its own blind and often irrational opposition to paying public officials salaries commensurate with their responsibilities. The result is democracy at its worst.

First, a mostly deserved increase will be denied—granted that some members, as in any union or corporation, haven't really earned a higher salary. Second, but not less important, many members will be forced to continue seeking outside honorariums to augment their Government pay—and those "speaking fees" too often will be paid by predatory interests, inevitably diminishing the independence of Congress. Third, the pay increase was scheduled for Federal attorneys and judges, executive branch officials, the President—many of whom earn nothing like what the private sector would pay them and all of whom will be denied vital additional income, basically because of the public's contempt for Congress.

The net effect, in all three branches of Government, will be to make it more difficult for men and women without income other than salary to serve in important Government positions, and more likely that only people of wealth or dependence on special interests will be able or willing to serve in those offices. That's hardly what the people wanted, but it's what their righteous outrage will bring about.

CONGRESS: PATHOLOGY OF A PAY RAISE

(By Nelson W. Polsby)

BERKELEY, CALIF.—The occasional public exercise of setting salaries for members of Congress brings out several of the pathologies with which our political system is richly endowed. House Speaker Jim Wright's call for a vote on the pay raise for public officials is a case in point. Even a Washington-watcher from the other side of the continent can spot three symptoms.

Congress-bashing by the news media. It is truly funny to see grossly overpaid television news personalities who haven't the foggiest idea what members of Congress actually do declaring themselves tribunes of the people and complaining about a Congressional pay raise.

I suppose I would listen with more sympathy if I had not, over the years in the course of my work, spent time following members of Congress around—sometimes for as long as a week—just to get a feel for what the actual life of a member is like.

It turns out that they do complicated and difficult work. Some members do it better and more conscientiously than others, but a great many of them do it rather well. The work requires a great deal of energy. For many legislators, it includes the mastery of a substantial body of knowledge related to their committees, the political tasks of building coalitions and shaping agreements among diverse parties, and the administrative tasks involved in serving constituents and supervising a sizeable staff.

Members frequently have to fly back and forth between their home districts and the capital, and they maintain full schedules on both ends. They must keep their tempers in dealing with one another and with the public, and conceal their boredom in the endless meetings that they are required to attend. Because they have to coordinate their lives in order to be on hand to cast votes, legislative work has a lot of hurry-up-and-wait in it.

The point is not to claim that members deserve hardship pay or sympathy. What they deserve is respect and a decent standard of living for doing responsible professional work.

The Congress of the United States is by far the most demanding and powerful popularly elected representative legislative body known to world history and we ought to be proud to support its members according to a reasonable standard.

We ought to take account of the facts that members have to maintain two domiciles, educate their children and pay all the other bills that their comparably successful classmates from college and law school manage, on average, to do a lot more easily than they do.

Congress-bashing by members of Congress. No doubt, in the best of all possible worlds, members would set fair salaries for themselves after due deliberation and a roll call vote, such as the Speaker of the House called for yesterday. The news media can't resist the cheap shot, however, and the members know it. This knowledge doth make cowards of—well, maybe not all of them, but a lot of them.

So the Senate piously voted no on the pay raise, in the fervent hope—but disappointed hope—that the House would not vote at all and let the pay raise just happen, as according to law it could if both chambers did not disapprove. Some members genuinely and sincerely don't want the pay raise of course—perhaps because they are already rich, abnormally frugal or have modest expenses. But it takes great obtuseness not to see that these conditions do not obtain for a great many members and that it is in the public interest to keep Congress a place to which ordinary middle-class people might aspire. This means keeping pay abreast of the realities in high-cost Washington. I use the word realities advisedly. Rent there isn't cheap.

Holding the rest of the Government hostage. This pathology occurs because legislators are afraid (see above) to give themselves pay raises without some sort of protection, so they link the pay for Federal judges and senior civil servants and political executives to Congressional salaries. The judges, who are foregoing mountains of money by remaining in the public sector, and the top people in the executive branch, who are ridiculously undercompensated, are held hostage.

If the all-around inequity of the situation gets bad enough, members of Congress figure that maybe Congress can get some relief too. Obviously, ther is no reason to link the salaries of the three branches in this fashion other than expediency. The fact that the editorial pages are filled with denunciations of this expediency unfortunately validates the suspicions of members that if they were out there all by themselves, a pay raise would never stand a chance.

It is pretty clear, therefore, even from 3,000 miles away, why Congress chose to delegate the job of salary-setting to an arms length commission. Elected officials don't like to be martyrs. It is just too hard for too many of them to take the flak and make a public case in their own behalf, even for the majority who privately are convinced that there is such a case. They feel they need an independent commission to make the case for them and they are probably right. The commission did its job professionally. It came up with eminently reasonable and defensible conclusions. The unfavorable reaction to its recommendations has been mean-spirited, unrealistic and bad for the well-being of the country.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask this body to apply the lessons learned through the pay raise issue and work for equality in pay for all levels of workers in the public and private sectors.

I have always been a strong advocate for equality in pay both in the public and private sectors. We must start at the bottom and raise the minimum wage so that poor families have a chance to break the vicious cycle of poverty. Better child care and medical and parental leave policies must be implemented so men and women who work to support families can do so without exacting a terrible toll on themselves and their family.

Let us take this opportunity to examine where our priorities are in the public sector. We must reform the entire pay system to reflect the need for top quality people in the civil service. We are losing our best scientists and engineers and no longer attracting new graduates due to a pay scale which cannot even begin to compete with the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, we must learn from the outpouring of response against raising our own pay. It is obvious that our constituents feel that inequities exist in the entire system which must be fixed before our pay is increased. Let us address these concerns in a constructive manner and use this mandate to push for equality for all people. Let us push for comprehensive pay reform for all public civil servants.

Mr. Speaker, you are the person to lead us in this drive for equality as you always have been in the past. Let us put the pay raise to rest and use the opportunity to push for change and for fairness for all.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

Mr. CARPER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to commend the Speaker for bringing this resolution before us.

This is not a proud day for the Congress, the executive branch, or our country. Our Nation's leaders are perceived, perhaps rightly, as looking out of their self-interest at a time when we clearly need to be setting an example. What kind of example? One of selflessness that other Americans might be called on to follow if we are to restore fiscal sanity in this Nation.

Having said that, let me point out that since 1970, the cost of living has risen by 205 percent. Meanwhile, Social Security benefits have been adjusted by 232 percent, civil service pensions by 197 percent, military personnel pay by 213 percent, Federal employees' pay by 133 percent and the pay of Members of Congress has risen by 110 percent since 1970.

While those numbers would suggest that our elected leaders have demonstrated restraint in raising our compensation in recent years, the events of the past few months have shattered any public perception of sacrifice on our part and understandably so.

Federal statute already prescribes a fairer and more equitable means of adjusting the compensation of Congress, Federal judges and senior executive branch officals, if only we would abide by it. Regrettably, we do not. Existing law calls for adjusting the salaries of senior Government officials by the same percentage each year that we adjust the pay of most other Federal employees. If they receive a 4-percent increase, so would we. Conversely, if they receive no annual increase one year, neither would we.

Instead of abiding by that policy each year, the Congress frequently excludes itself and senior Federal officials from that annual modest adjustment. By doing so, we thus set the stage for outrageous increases like the one recommended last year by the Quadrennial Commission and President Reagan.

There is a better way to adjust our salaries, and it is already the law of the land. It is fair. It is understandable. It is imminently defensible. We must begin to abide by that policy each year. In doing so, we can begin to restore the loss of public confidence while this latest, sad chapter is our history has precipitated.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3½ minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI].

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to this resolution. I strongly support the pay raise recommended by the Quadrennial Commission and endorsed by President Reagan and President Bush because I believe that all of us—each and every one of us—deserve it. To date, I have stayed out of the public debate over this issue, but in the past week I have heard about as much as I can stand.

I can't remember a more disheartening or embarrassing debate. I have served in this House for 30 years. I am proud of what I do and you, my colleagues, should feel the same way. The bashing that we have received in the press over this issue not only demeans us, it demeans all public servants. The criticism that has been heaped on us is bad enough, why are so many of us agreeing with it? It is high time we stopped whipping ourselves.

Each Member of this House, Democrat and Republican, is worth a salary of $135,000 a year. Our decisions affect all Americans. The domestic and foreign policies of the most powerful Nation in the world are shaped in the committee rooms and on the floor of this House. The responsibility we exercise is unmatched in any private sector job.

I'm not up here to sing the blues. I asked for this job and I work hard to keep it. In my hometown of Chicago they call politics a blood sport. I have been pretty successful at it. I don't apologize for getting in the arena and I'll be damned if I'll apologize for winning. Yet that is what this debate has reduced us to—apologizing for serving in the U.S. House of Representatives. That is wrong. I don't say that with any malice, just profound disappointment.

Our failure to stand up for ourselves is bad enough, but we are holding hostage the pay scale of the rest of the Government. Failure to raise the pay of Members of Congress, the judiciary and senior administration officials is irresponsible. We will lose good people in the Congress—the young Members trying to raise a family, educate their kids, and maintain two residences. We will lose good judges. We will lose good people who administer programs affecting the lives of millions of people. The quality of work performed by all three branches of Government will suffer because we don't have the guts to say what we are worth.

Two years ago, I offered a proposal to raise the pay caps for all three branches while meeting the political concerns about the salary hike for the Congress. The proposal is simple. For the judicial and executive branches, pay caps would be increased by the amount recommended by the Quadrennial Commission. Members of Congress, however, would have a choice. At the beginning of each Congress, they could sign in at whatever pay they think they are worth, ranging from the current salary of $89,500 to the $135,000 recommended by the Commission. That salary would remain fixed for the duration of their term.

I would sign for the highest end of the scale. If the people in the neighborhoods of the Eighth Congressional District of Illinois conclude that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, with 30 years of experience in the House, working on their behalf is not worth top dollar, they are free to make that clear in the next election. In the next Congress, they would have the opportunity to address their grievances to a new Representative. I owe my constituents a great deal, including hard work and good judgment, but I also owe them a measure of self-respect.

Other Members might sign in at a lesser amount because of regional differences in the cost of living, their tenure, or level of responsibility. That's fine. Let's just stop the breast-beating and finger pointing. Let each of us decide and live with the consequences.

You know how hard you work and you shoudn't be embarrassed to say it. You work hard here and you work hard in your districts. And the hardest thing you do is tell your families that they must sacrifice year in and year out. Sure there are prerequisites that come with the job. But you know as well as I do that perks can't make up for the birthdays, ballgames, holidays, and meals that we miss. When was the last time you skipped a town meeting for a school play? If you can't remember, ask your spouse. You maintain two households but you're never home.

My colleagues, you deserve this pay raise. The public servants in the judicial and executive branches deserve this pay raise.

I am proud to be a member of this great institution—proud of my service—and proud to vote in favor of the pay raise. I would like to see you join me.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON].

Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to those individual Members, particularly the younger ones with large families, including their children who may be ready for college, I rise in favor of this resolution to block the unconscionable 50-percent pay raise due to take effect tonight at midnight.

The question today is "Does the U.S. Congress as a body deserve a pay raise?" And the answer is "Absolutely not."

This Congress should never get a pay raise of any kind until they act responsibly in dealing with the outrageous Federal deficit which the Congress is primarily responsible for, since the Congress, and only the Congress, create huge deficits by the spending bills it passes year after year after year.

I would also hope, Mr. Speaker, that after this pay raise is blocked by the successful passage of this resolution, this Congress will take action in two bills I have introduced.

H.R. 383 would make future recommendations for raises advisory instead of mandatory, thereby requiring a vote by Congress, and H.R. 384, requiring that any raise—whether by vote or not—be delayed until after a newly elected Congress takes office.

The American people demand this legislation in order to hold the Congress accountable.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RIDGE].

Mr. RIDGE. Mr. Speaker, your decision to allow the vote this afternoon was certainly the right decision for all Members, and I thank you for that opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this resolution and against the recommended pay increase.

Someone once warned that you should be careful what you pray for because you might get it. The personal gain individual members would realize would be offset 1,000 times over with the loss of our credibility and opportunities for leadership. Acceptance of a massive pay increase while avoiding a vote conjures up the worst possible image of us as individuals, as leaders, and as an institution. While I believe just as strongly that Members of Congress should receive small automatic increases, I simply must reject the magnitude of this increase and the procedure which exists to avoid accountability. Many of my colleagues have noted the difficult lifestyle and the strain that it puts on family and personal relationships and I concur. While these elements of our service certainly justify the smaller increase to which I previously referred they do not warrant the proposed 51 percent increase.

I was reminded during this debate that my father, who worked two jobs for practically his entire life, managed to educate three children through graduate school. He was not home very much either. He managed to see that his children were all very well educated on an income that, in its best year, was one-third of the congressional salary. That was difficult. That was sacrifice.

During the course of this debate, the argument has often been suggested that we need higher salaries to attract better people to Congress. Unfortunately, this approach is not particularly persuasive either. My colleagues in the House, we are surrounded by talented men and women who were attracted to service and won their elections in open races. The primary problem with attracting people to service is not that salaries are too low, but that the advantages of incumbency are too high.

To have accepted this massive pay increase without a vote would have been a shameless act and a shameful violation of public trust. Once again, Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving us this opportunity to vote and encourage my colleagues to support this resolution in opposition to the recommended pay increase.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, having been around here for 3 weeks, I will take only 30 seconds and rise in opposition to this.

Mr. Speaker, the proposals we have heard for a pay increase for Members of Congress, whether it be a 50-percent increase or a 30-percent increase, are out of line with what Americans feel is prudent in these times of budget deficits and moderate increases in cost-of-living allowances for the average worker.

Furthermore, I am opposed to the current process by which a pay raise for Members of Congress is approved. I believe both the Senate and the House of Representatives should vote on any such proposal.

Lastly, I believe any increase approved by a vote of Congress should not take effect until the session which follows such an approval. Congressmen should not be voting themselves a pay raise that takes effect immediately.

While I do believe Members of Congress are entitled to reasonable increases in their rate of pay, I most heartily agree with the majority of Americans who disapprove of the amount of this proposed increase and the manner in which it is being handled.

One of our greatest responsibilities as Members of the U.S. House of Representatives is to preserve the respect most Americans feel toward this body.

I sincerely believe that discussion and debate on this topic will bring about a less complicated and more open process for properly compensating Members of Congress and other top Government officials.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PARRIS].

Mr. PARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution disapproving of the Quadrennial Commission's recommendation that Members of Congress receive a 51-percent pay increase.

When this House votes shortly on the resolution of disapproval, I hope that a majority of my colleagues will agree with me that a 51-percent pay raise for Members of Congress is wholely unacceptable in light of large budget deficits and in the face of limitations which this Congress has placed on cost-of-living increases for Federal employees and retirees.

Aside from consideration of the amount of increase, I will strongly oppose this and any future increase in congressional pay unless there is an intervening election before the salary increase becomes effective.

I do, however, strongly support a considerable increase in pay for members of our senior Federal executive service so that we may better attract and retain the most highly qualified individuals for critical policy positions within our Federal Government. I also strongly believe that a significant increase in salary for Federal judges is in order so that we may attract the most qualified individuals for service on the bench.

Something is seriously wrong with the system when our judges are drawing less salary than are many 25-year-old, midlevel associates in law firms around the country.

In my judgment, the question of increases for senior executives and judges should be forever separated from the issue of congressional pay raises.

I urge my colleagues to support the resolution of disapproval.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOEHLERT].

Mr. BOEHLERT. Mr. Speaker, it is important that the Quadrennial Commission report.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the issue before us is not whether Congress deserves a raise, but whether this 50-percent raise is an appropriate amount at an appropriate time? And the answer to this last question is no.

Yes, most of us are hard working, far more hard working than some of our critics may believe. But whether some one in any business gets a big raise is affected by far more than whether one is deserving.

Imagine a private business that ended up the year in the red. Would that business start the new year by giving an employee or executive, no matter how deserving, a 50-percent raise? Of course not. And that is the situation we face here. The business of the Federal Government has ended 1988 in the red with a big deficit. And we by our own laws are called on to lead the country in reducing this deficit. To pass this raise at this time is to abdicate our leadership responsibility to bring the budget into balance.

This is why we should vote against this pay raise.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. MACHTLEY].

Mr. MACHTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Speaker has done the right thing, at least giving Members the opportunity to vote.

It is an honor for me to be here to address this group and to address an important issue. In deference to my colleagues who have been here for many years, the issue in my district is not one of whether we are worth the money, the issue is not one of whether we should be paid more, the issue is one of leadership. The issue is one of respect, not for ourselves, but for our electorate.

The issue in my district is, will we take a pay increase without a vote? Will we take a pay increase in a time of a large national deficit without being accountable for that pay increase?

This is the first time I am able to speak before this body. When elected, I was asked what can one voice do amongst the so many great minds and the people. That voice, today, can represent the will of my district and tell Members that we must do what good leadership requires. We must vote not only our conscience, we must vote not for our pocketbooks, but for the will of our people.

I, therefore, speak on behalf of my district and the people of the United States asking that we turn down this pay increase.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAVENEL].

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, for almost 40 years I have been active in the political arena, both as a Democrat and as a Republican. I have seen political storms come and I have seen them go, but never, never have I seen the people so incensed over an issue such as this pay raise question. Their will has been expressed by millions and millions of voices. Those Members who do not hear them are not only politically deaf but also politically blind—handicaps usually fatal to Members in this profession.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, we should ask ourselves why the outcry on this issue, both from the people and from the media has been so intense. The perception is that we in the Congress have been responsible for massive deficits and a sea of red ink. That perception is indeed reality. It is simply not possible to promote spending cutbacks to programs near and dear to the hearts of our constituents and take a 50-percent pay raise.

I urge my colleagues to support the resolution of disapproval.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH].

□ 1250

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed 50-percent pay raise has obviously aroused a great deal of opposition throughout this land. Americans all across America have been disgusted at Congress, but, more importantly, the process is a bad process.

Can we look our constituents in the eye and say, regardless of how we feel about this issue, that we should not have a vote? The answer is, no, we cannot.

I do commend you, Mr. Speaker, for finally calling for a vote on this matter.

Yesterday a Member of this body said she would be watching opponents of the pay raise to see which of us would accept or reject the raise if it went into effect. Today is the day the American people will be watching. They will be watching to see which of us is willing to set an example in the fight against the deficit.

Mr. Speaker, we are public servants. The American people can pay us anything they wish. We do not have to like it, and we do not have to serve, but that is their right. We are not an elitist group, Mr. Speaker, we are public servants.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. KOLBE].

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the resolution to reject the recommendations of the Quadrennial Commission on Executive, Legislative and Judicial Salaries. I commend Speaker WRIGHT for acceding to the will of the House and the American people. The oceans of ink poured onto newsprint and personal stationery in past weeks has painted the landscape of public sentiment. The proposal to raise the pay for Members of Congress is clearly contrary to what the public believes is right and fair.

I support the resolution for several reasons:

First, a 50-percent pay increase at any one time simply cannot be justified. There are many sound arguments for a pay increase for Members of Congress and, because we don't get them on a regular basis, it can even be argued that the increase must be larger than a routine, annual adjustment. But that doesn't cut the mustard with the American people. They cannot understand why we should get an increase of this size, and at this time. And I agree with them.

Second, to vote ourselves a 50-percent pay increase, then turn around and ask Federal managers to hold the line on spending in all the other parts of the budget to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets for deficit reduction cannot be reconciled. Similarly, it is the wrong signal to send, to the scores of groups from across our districts who plead for increased spending for programs in which they have a justified interest, when we accept a 50-percent increase for ourselves.

Third, the process is wrong. As my colleague from California, Mr. FAZIO, has said, "we should deal honestly with the issue of compensation for Congress. But honesty in this case means a vote on the pay raise."

This has been a very sad chapter in the history of the House of Representatives. It has strained friendships and needlessly sowed doubts in the minds of Members about the wisdom or judgment of our colleagues. We must put this vote behind us and go forward. Can we have the foresight and courage to explore legislation in a bipartisan, nonconfrontational manner which will allow adequate compensation for public servants in all three branches of the Federal Government?

If honoraria was wrong yesterday, it is wrong today. We should move swiftly to enact the ban that was planned for a vote this Thursday. Additionally, we should abolish the grandfather clause allowing certain Members to convert for personal use, campaign donations contributed for their reelection.

We should restore the Commission's proposed pay increases for judges and senior executives of the Government which has been tied to congressional pay. One of the lamentable results of today's vote is that we will deny to judges and senior executives badly needed improvements in their compensation. I am alarmed—and I know many of my colleagues are too—by the loss of qualified judges and executives in Government. We must not allow our personal pique at the loss of our own salary increase to keep us from doing what is right for other Government officials.

Mr. Speaker, I think the only solution to the problem of our own compensation is to give us the same cost-of-living adjustments that other Federal employees are given. I know that has been tried before, and it hasn't worked. But if we tie it to the reforms of compensation that I've already mentioned, and if we require that any larger increases can only come through the recommendation of the Commission and must be voted on by both House and Senate and not go into effect until the next Congress convenes, I think we can get the support we need.

I believe it is important to adequately compensate the country's leadership, but the pay increase is too high, the procedure has been too low, and the rationale, too late. This is the people's House and the people have spoken. Now it is our job to put together a responsible plan to address a thorough reform effort.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the joint resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity that is being afforded us today for a straightforward vote on the congressional pay raise. It's a vote that has been weeks in coming, and one that I really believe is a victory for the American people who elected us to Congress.

I realize only too well that this issue is not an easy one for many, particularly in light of the need to end honoraria. It is important, however, that we go on record as we are today. We are elected to our offices by voters, and we owe it to all of them to be held accountable on this and any other issue that affects this country and its policies and purse.

I am one of a handful of Congressmen who several weeks ago called upon the leadership for this vote. I did so because I am against this type of pay raise for Congress, and believed that only by voting on the issue would we fully confront it and begin to resolve a lingering and divisive issue.

The problem with the pay raise proposal was not only the process by which it was to have taken effect, but the amount and the timing. This was no modest raise tracking inflation, which many Americans receive. It was a 51-percent pay raise on top of a $89,500 congressional salary that was both ridiculous and outrageous. That 51-percent increase alone amounted to nearly twice the amount of money that most Vermonters earn in a year. And it was being proposed at a time when this Congress must act on some extremely difficult decisions concerning budget tightening to deflate the Federal deficit. It's almost unthinkable that Congress could have voted itself an enormous pay raise and then turned around to consider cuts in programs affecting other people and their abilities to earn a living, in some cases from minimal wages.

I am pleased that we apparently will not be dealing in such painful absurdity. The House of Representatives today has said "no" to the pay raise proposal, and presumably will not have to revisit the issue. I hope now that we soon adopt measures to end honoraria, and then get on with issues that have far more relevance and importance to what we were elected to do here in Congress.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD].

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice my strongest possible opposition to the pay increase for Members of Congress proposed by the Quadrennial Commission and endorsed by Presidents Reagan and Bush.

I believe that the American public deserves a full accounting from the House of Representatives on this proposal, and I am very pleased that Speaker Wright has let the will of the people prevail by scheduling a vote on this very timely and sensitive issue. House Joint Resolution 129, the resolution of disapproval before us today, must be adopted with all possible speed so we can put this issue behind us and get on with the important work which lies ahead.

We are at a critical time in our Nation's history. The Federal budget deficit has been cited time and time again as the overriding concern of the public, while, at the same time, substantial Federal expenditures are increasingly being requested for such varied and vital programs as the war on drugs, education, health care, transportation, housing, the needs of our elderly citizens and those of the scientific community. As Members of Congress, we are obligated to achieve further, substantial deficit reduction and a measured response to these funding needs.

In order to meet that end, we all must make sacrifices and tighten our belts. Let's start right here at home and show the American people that we are willing and able to forgo a pay increase, work together for the good of our country to hold the line on Federal spending, and meet our deficit reduction goals. I am confident that, together with the new administration, we can achieve these objectives.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the resolution of disapproval.

Mr. Speaker, I have expressed my support of the increase in pay proposed by the Quadrennial Commission for Members of Congress, the judiciary, and the senior executive service. Although it is quite clear from yesterday's procedural vote that the pay recommendations will be disapproved, I will cast my vote in favor of the recommendations because I believe they are as valid today as when President Reagan submitted them to the Congress and President Bush announced his support for them.

Far more important than the amount recommended is the process by which the amount is arrived at. Under Federal law a Presidential Commission is established every 4 years to recommend compensation levels for Federal judges, Senators, Representatives, and senior executive branch officials. This procedure was originally established to avoid the appearance of conflict created by a Member of Congress voting on his or her own salary increase, while assuring that senior Government officials were able to at least keep pace with the rate of inflation. Thus only the Presidentially appointed Commission, comprised of people not serving in Government, would set pay rates, but its members would not personally benefit from the increases. It is ironic that this procedure is now one primary objective to the pay adjustments.

Congress has repeatedly demonstrated that it is incapable of dealing with the issue of its compensation. In fact, since I came to Congress in 1977, Members have voted to limit or eliminate on six occasions cost-of-living adjustments that were given to other Federal employees, retirees, Social Security and other beneficiaries. If top-level Federal salaries since 1969 had adjusted solely for inflation, they would now be making approximately $140,000.

Consumer Price Index statistics tell the story. Between 1970 and the end of 1987, the cost of living, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, rose at a rate of 204.5 percent. During the same period, letter carriers at the USPS have seen wage increases of 239.4 percent; Social Security beneficiaries have seen their entitlements raise 232.1 percent; military personnel have seen their pay increase by 212.7 percent—excluding fringe benefits; private sector white collar workers have received wage increases—through 1986—of 196.5 percent; private sector blue collar workers have received—through 1986—wage advances of 183.8 percent; and Federal retirees have had pension adjustments of 197.1 percent. During the same period, Members of Congress have received pay adjustments totaling only 109.6 percent.

One of the most important recommendations of the Commission was a ban on honoraria, which I strongly support. Members of Congress are permitted to earn a fixed percentage of their salary from outside speaking, which in my view can create at least the appearance of impropriety. By rejecting the Commission's recommendations, we will lose a great opportunity to restore a measure of public confidence in its public officials.

One other factor which must be mentioned, and which has only received media attention in the last few days, is the very high cost of living in the Washington, DC, area, especially for Members with young families.

In the best of all worlds, I would support a procedure whereby these salary changes would be phased in over several years to avoid the appearance of excessiveness. While that option is not available to Members today, I would hope that in the future we could find a way to make simple cost-of-living adjustments to our own salaries, as with the wages of most other Federal employees.

The recommendations of the Commission affect not only Members of Congress but some 384 executive branch officials and 1,115 Federal judges. Additionally, another 10,000 senior executive and judicial branch official would be linked to the recommended pay increases. Some have suggested that decoupling the judicial and executive branch official's pay from that of Members of Congress would resolve the dilemma faced by this House. The real effect of that action, however, would be to render Congress an unequal and inferior branch of Government, which is clearly not what the framers of the Constitution intended.

If we expect to continue to attract to public office the most qualified people, we must be willing to provide appropriate compensation, at least keeping pace with inflation. Failure to do so will surely accelerate the Congress becoming a millionaires club where only the superrich can afford to participate. This, I believe, is a sure way to undermine representative government.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MOODY].

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the joint resolution.

I owe my constituents a great deal, including hard work and good judgment.

I also owe them my honest assessment of every single issue—even one so subject to political posturing and pandering as this one has been.

I am proud of the job I do. I believe I earn every penny of my current salary or the proposed one.

But you don't get good Congressmen—or good Cabinet officials or good Federal judges—by freezing their pay.

Here are the few points I would like to make to my constituents:

First. What does the vote mean?

I will vote to let the special, nonpartisan Commission set the pay for Members of Congress. For Congress not to set its own pay.

This will be the right vote.

It is wrong for Congress to set its own pay because of the gross conflict of interest in doing so.

The whole purpose of the Commission was to take Congress out of the role of setting its own pay, and simply vote "yes" or "no" on the Commission's proposal. I support that approach and protested the way the 1987 raise was handled—and declined to take the 1987 raise as a result.

Second. Is the job worth $135,000?

Absolutely yes. This is one of the most important and most demanding jobs in America. Congress makes daily decisions of awesome responsibility—issues of life or death, war or peace. Issues affecting all Americans: capital punishment and other penalties for crime, drug law, troops to Lebanon, abortion, health care coverage, treatment of seniors, auto safety, airline safety, education, arms control—all far outweigh most decisions made by executives in business.

Congress has plenty of flaws, but over the years it has shaped policies that have made us one of the greatest and fairest governments on the globe. Congress outperforms every other parliament on Earth.

The proposed raise would cost 8 cents per constituent, while a good Congressman make many decisions—good or bad—valued at millions—or even billions of dollars. The Federal budget is over $4,000 per person—the Pentagon alone spends about $1,200 per person. Isn't it worth the 8 cents raise if it improves congressional oversight over the way the $4,000 is spent? Over time, freezing pay will lower the quality of talent in Congress.

Third. Was 50 percent too big a raise at this time?

Probably yes, although the Quadrennial Commission set it to make up lost purchasing power from previous years.

Many years—most years—Congressmen received no pay increase.

But on a take-it-or-leave-it basis, the hike proposed is better than no hike.

Fourth. Do all Members deserve $135,000?

Perhaps not, but the best ones clearly do.

The $135,000 recommendation by the Quadrennial Commission would be the ceiling, not the floor. Congressmen can always turn back some of their pay for whatever reason, including a belief that they aren't worth it.

Those taking less than $135,000 could claim to their voters thay they are sacrificing. Those taking the full amount could claim they are worth it, based on performance.

The voters will—and should—judge whether they are receiving value for their money.

Fifth. Would I serve at a lower pay?

Yes, I would although some very good people would not. Since they have other offers with higher pay.

This is particularly true at the Cabinet level and for some judiciary.

But it's also true of some of the best Members of Congress, where the cost of maintaining two homes—one in the most expensive real estate market in America outside Manhattan—makes $89,000 far less attractive than it seems.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] for yielding this time to me, and I want to thank the Speaker for bringing this resolution to the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pay raise.

I share the sense of frustration that many Members feel on this issue. On the one hand, it is a conflict of interest for us to vote on our own pay. On the other, when we attempt to let an impartial commission set our pay, we are accused of ducking the issue.

I am afraid that there is no way we can ever address this issue without bringing about cries of outrage from one quarter or another.

In any event, I am glad that we now have the opportunity to vote on the record on this issue.

This is not a question of whether we are worth it, or whether we work hard enough to deserve it. If that were the question, the answer on this vote would definitely be to approve the pay increase.

This is an issue where perception is just as important as anything else. In that regard, it is clear to me that a salary increase of 51 percent comes at the wrong time and sends the wrong signal to the American public. With a Federal budget deficit in excess of $140 billion, Congress should be providing leadership in reducing Federal spending and that means starting with ourselves.

While I understand that salaries must remain competitive in order to attract qualified people to Government service, I also believe that public service requires some sacrifice. This means we have to set an example.

I nevertheless want to point out that, at some point, we are going to have to develop some means for addressing the salary issue that does not bring about the furor that we have witnessed in the current case.

The reason why the Commission's recommendation was so large—51 percent—is that we have time and time again excluded ourselves from routine cost-of-living raises. As a result, our salaries have fallen behind what is paid to many others in public life.

In my home State of New Jersey, there are numerous individuals in high posts in various departments and authorities that make substantially more than Members of Congress. We are going to have to address this disparity at some point. At the very least we are going to have to include ourselves in the cost-of-living increases that are routinely granted to all Federal workers and retirees.

In the interim, though, we must recognize that pay raise is excessive and unreasonable, and should be voted down.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I took to this floor and I said that it would be the height of hypocrisy to speak out against this pay raise and then take the money. Well, we will not see that hypocrisy today or tomorrow or anytime in the near future because I don't believe there will be a pay raise.

We have lost an opportunity, Mr. Speaker, not only to bring pay raises for a host of people in line with what an outside independent commission told us was right, but we have lost the opportunity to reform our own pay system.

I have always told my constituents that voting on our own pay was an untenable situation. I think we are going to see that demonstrated loud and clear today. I hope that the demagogues among us will rejoice.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make one more point. We see a lot of members of the press here in the galleries. I see more there now than I have seen for a long time. I hope they will be here until the late hours when we are working on the problems of the day: the problems of the homeless and the FSLIC problem and the other crises we face. We will welcome them. And I hope that the people who work for the periodicals who just voted out the board of directors who asked them to reveal their outside income will reconsider their position.

It has been a tough few days.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to thank the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI] for his courage and for giving this Member a feeling of self-worth. I think we all needed it today.

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take a moment to thank you for your leadership in guiding the House through this most difficult time. I also want to commend you for proving our representative form of Government does work. When the American people made clear their overwhelming desire to have Congress vote on the proposed pay raise, you made sure we had the opportunity to cast that vote.

Today, we are going to vote down a pay raise that was too large and that came at the wrong time. In my district, the 13th District of Texas, the recession in the energy and agriculture industries have hit hard. The vast majority of the people in my district have had to sacrifice during the last few years. They have made do with less, and they don't understand why Congressmen can't make do with $89,500 per year.

Apparently, the people in many other congressional districts felt much the same way. And, Members of the House are voting as good representatives should. We are putting our own personal interests aside and doing what we were elected to do—we are voting the will of our people.

Does this mean this issue is over? Far from it. As one of my colleagues pointed out today, we have only begun to debate this issue. We have many questions we must ask ourselves.

Is our current system of determining pay for Congressmen, Cabinet officials, Federal judges and other senior Government officials adequate?

How do we attract the best possible people to Government service, given our limited financial resources?

Should Congress even be allowed to vote on its own pay?

The answers to these questions won't come easy, and I don't pretend to have all the answers. But, we must start reexamining the pay process immediately. Certainly, Government service will never pay as well as work in the private sector. And, probably it shouldn't. Government service is an honor, not a right. Serving the people sometimes requires a sacrifice that patriotic Americans should be willing to make.

At the same time, top research scientists, qualified physicians, agriculture experts, businessmen and policy experts should not become poor in Government service. While we can't match the private sector in pay, we shouldn't lag so far behind as to make Government service financially impossible.

We also must find a way to relieve Congress of the ethical dilemma of determining its own pay while making sure that the will of our bosses—the people—is served.

A difficult challenge, to be sure, but one I'm confident this House can meet.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, today I voted no on the resolution to disapprove the recommendations of the Quadrennial Commission to increase the pay of Federal judges, senior executive branch officials, and Members of Congress.

I have consistently stated publicly that I object to having to vote on my own pay for the reason that to do so is an inherent conflict of interest. Accordingly, I felt that the creation of an independent, nonpartisan outside Commission to set the pay of Federal judges, senior executive branch officials, and Members of Congress was the fairest and most objective way of avoiding the conflict of interest in setting my own salary.

Mr. Speaker, that Commission has rendered a report recommending the salaries of all three branches of Government, which recommendations have the approval of former President Ronald Reagan and President George Bush.

It is unfortunate that a series of events have prevented the Commission's recommendations from going into effect under operation of law. Consequently, as Members of Congress we are once again confronted with voting on our own pay.

The Commission's recommendations were to compensate for the fact that over the past 20 years, wage and salary advances for higher earners in the private sector have allowed large numbers of persons to catch up and surpass the advances of senior Federal officials, Federal judges and Members of Congress.

During this 20-year period that Congress has denied itself cost-of-living raises, I have consistently voted to increase wages and Social Security benefits for workers. I have supported increased benefits for the elderly, those on welfare and the poor, including financial aid for our youth, and health benefits for the sick and disabled, and education for all. In short, name any group or category of Americans, and I have been there fighting and voting for them—fighting whatever odds to improve the quality of their lives as Americans.

Today, in spite of my desire not to do so, I am asked to vote on a matter in which I have a personal interest.

During my entire career, I have never ducked a vote. I vote today, as I have always voted on every issue. I vote my conscience. I have never voted on any issue while worrying about my reelection. I do not intend to start now.

As I vote today, I must also be honest. Many of my colleagues are comfortable with a public posture of refusing a pay raise while secretly coveting it. I cannot in good conscience do this.

Last, I know how devoted I am to my constituents and how hard I work on their behalf. I work for them 7 days a week, and I average 14 to 16 hours per workday. I give them a quality of service that is unsurpassed by anyone else in Congress. I have earned the salary recommended by the Commission. I am comfortable with my vote today. The Members who have today rejected the pay raise know the value of their services, and I know the value of mine.

Mr. SANGMEISTER. Mr. Speaker, almost 20 years ago, the authority to set the level of compensation for Members of Congress was transferred from the Congress to the newly created Quadrennial Commission. It was believed that Congressmen should not have the power to determine their own salaries.

In a recent review of executive, judicial and congressional salaries, the Quadrennial Commission found current compensation levels to be deficient. In terms of real spending power, congressional salaries had diminished by 33 percent. As a result, the Commission recommended a 51-percent increase in salary. President Reagan agreed and endorsed this pay raise which was forwarded to Congress for approval. Granted, everyone deserves to be properly and adequately compensated for their drive, determination and strong work ethic. However, I cannot imagine a situation where any employer could find it affordable to give so many employees a 51 percent pay raise. Our employer, the Federal Government, is already deeply in debt and in a fiscal crisis. This pay raise is totally out of line and we cannot ask working Americans to make sacrifices while we become the benefactors of a substantial increase in pay. I cannot, in good conscience, increase my personal income at taxpayers' expense, and at the same time expect to legitimately accomplish the mandate of my electorate in gaining control of our Nation's debt.

Last month I introduced a bill calling on my colleagues to vote on this salary increase. Today we will have the opportunity to vote our conscience and to properly and effectively represent those who worked so hard to elect us to this respected office. I hope all of my colleagues will join me in voting no on this pay raise.

Mr. BRENNAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 129, a resolution disapproving the proposed 50-percent salary increase for Members of Congress. I am pleased that the full House will have an opportunity to express their views on this important issue.

During the past 2 months of public debate over the pay raise issue, I have repeatedly expressed to my constituents the need for a recorded vote. In fact, I introduced legislation, H.R. 674, which calls for a recorded vote on any congressional salary increase and a delay in receiving that raise if a majority votes to enact one.

While I am confident that the residents of Maine support an adequate level of compensation for their elected representatives, I cannot support—nor do I believe that Mainers support—a 50-percent congressional salary increase. There are many important unmet needs affecting our great Nation. Soon, we will be asking for shared sacrifices among our constituents to assist in restoring fiscal health to our economy. A 50-percent increase would send the wrong signal to our constituents that we are serious about addressing the enormous Federal deficit.

I am pleased to see this resolution being debated before the full House today so that this divisive issue can be put to rest. We need to begin work on the pressing problems confronting our Nation. To enable us to begin that important work, I urge my colleagues to join me in voting no on the proposed congressional salary increase.

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to both the pay raise and the process which brought us to this vote today.

The pay raise itself has caused an uproar across the land, because of its size and because of the way in which it was proposed.

The Commission proposal to raise the salaries of Members of Congress, judges, and top administration officials has become the top news story out of Washington for the past 2 months.

My no vote on this 51-percent pay increase has been widely reported under headlines such as: "Jersey Lawmakers Oppose Pay Increase for Congress," "Representative GALLO Opposed to Pay Hike for Congress," "GALLO Sponsors Bill to Defer Congressional Pay Raises."

Yet my phones are ringing off the hook and my mailbox has been overflowing with individual protests.

The people's message is clear: The pay raise is too high, so Members of Congress should vote it down and change the law.

Today, we have taken the first step, but I want to see a law passed that will do what the Founders of the Nation wanted to do 200 years ago. They wanted an 11th amendment to the original Bill of Rights that prohibited Members of Congress from giving themselves a pay raise.

Many State constitutions, including New Jersey's, currently require all pay raises to be deferred until after the next election.

I am cosponsor of H.R. 759, sponsored by Representative TOM TAUKE, to reform the way we act on congressional pay raises.

Passage of this bill would do three things: Defer future congressional pay raises until a new Congress is elected and seated, require a recorded vote so that the public would know how each elected official voted, and separate consideration of congressional salaries from other Federal pay adjustments.

This is why I want to scrap the whole system and replace it with a simple up or down vote on a deferred pay raise for future Congresses. We must reopen the process in a way that we know was proposed by the individuals who gave us our original blueprint for Government.

Mr. HOLLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in strong opposition to any raise in pay for Members of Congress. I oppose a 50-percent pay increase, I oppose a 30-percent pay increase, I oppose any pay increase. Mr. Speaker, I was not only prepared, but anxious, to speak in opposition to the pay raise during yesterday's session. I was not only prepared, but anxious, to help lead the fight yesterday to force a rollcall vote on this issue. Unfortunately, bitterly cold weather closed roads and airports throughout central and north Louisiana yesterday, making it impossible for me to get to Washington.

Mr. Speaker, I realize as well as anyone that we Members of Congress have a difficult and demanding job. It is also expensive to maintain two homes. However, it is my belief that Congress is not, and should not be, the place to get rich. The people who founded America never intented that Members of Congress make a career of their Government service. I don't intend to do so.

Mr. Speaker, Congress must also practice what it has begun to preach. I've been preaching for years about the need to apply financial common sense to the Federal Government. We all know how important it is that we eliminate the Federal budget deficit. Today, we have the opportunity to show that we mean what we say. We cannot, on the one hand, talk about bringing the deficit down and, on the other, rush to raise our own salaries. Not many people in my congressional district get a 50-percent pay raise, or a 30-percent pay raise. What do we say to the young couple struggling to make ends meet while they rear young children? What do we say to our senior citizens living on fixed incomes? What can we say to organizations when they ask us for more money for programs and we tell them they must get by on less? I'm not prepared to take the money and run. I'm not willing to say, I'll take the money but you can't have it. I'm happy that we are having a rollcall vote on the issue here today. The idea of having an automatic pay increase bothers me as much as anything. Having a recorded vote is the right thing to do. Mr. Speaker, I'm proud to stand here today and vote against this salary grab.

Mr. HOCHBRUECKNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate the Members of this body for moving to reject former President Reagan's request for a massive pay raise for the legislative and executive branches of the Federal Government. By voting 380 to 48 to defeat this pay increase, the House of Representatives has demonstrated convincingly that democracy does work. The American people have spoken, and their Representatives have translated their will into decisive legislative action.

As I have stated from the start, the pay increases recommended by former President, Reagan, and supported by President Bush, were excessive and ill-timed. In a time when our Nation is reeling from enormous budget deficits which have almost tripled the national debt over the past 8 years, our Government should be setting a better example. It was entirely inappropriate to be asked by Mr. Reagan to increase by over 50 percent our own pay as well as that of senior executive branch employees, President Bush, and Vice President QUAYLE.

I am delighted to have helped resolve an issue that is of great importance in my district. I opposed this pay raise from the outset. More than 1,000 letters and telephone calls from my district assailing the pay raise reinforced my position on the issue.

Mr. Speaker, my vote today to defeat the pay raise helps to fulfill my obligation to my constituency. It is one very concrete example of democracy in action.

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the bill to disapprove the pay raises for senior executives, Federal judges, and Members of Congress. However, I wish to take the time to discuss how we got to this point, and to express my views on the current procedure for determining the compensation of top Federal officials.

The debate over appropriate compensation for Federal officials is as old as the Republic itself. In 1789, when Congress was in session for only brief periods during the year, its compensation ascertained by law was $6 per meeting per day. Congress' first attempt to raise its pay occurred in 1816. The political reaction caused a swift retreat; the public outcry was so great that the measure was repealed the next year.

The pattern emerged and was to be repeated. Subsequent generations of Senators and Representatives have shied away from voting to increase salaries, recognizing the inherent political risk attendant to such a vote. Because the compensation of Federal judges and senior executives has been historically linked to Members of Congress, the reluctance of Congress to raise its own pay has held down salaries in the other branches as well.

Faced with these political realities, escalating inflation, and continued attrition of top Federal employees, Congress passed the 1967 Federal Salary Act. The 1967 act was a civil service reform measure to address the contentious issue of Federal pay. It provided for appointment every 4 years of a commission on executive, legislative, and judicial salaries, with three members appointed by the President, two by the President of the Senate, two by the Speaker of the House, and two by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. The Commission is instructed to make salary recommendations and submit them to the President, who is in turn required to submit his own recommendation to Congress in his budget message. The President's recommendations then take effect subject to a process for congressional review.

Mr. Speaker, while I was not a Member of Congress when the original 1967 act passed, I have been here during subsequent modifications and it is a civil service procedure which I have supported. This method provides for a decision on top salary levels for all three branches while removing the political pressures that arise when the legislative branch alone makes these determinations.

Under the most recent amendment to the act, which was adopted in 1985, the President's recommendation becomes effective automatically, unless a joint resolution of disapproval is agreed to by both Houses of Congress within 30 days of the President's submission. The House is exercising that option today.

The recent Quadrennial Commission report found that Members of Congress, Federal judges, and senior executives have seen their salaries decline to 65 to 70 percent of what they were in 1969. That means they have experienced at least a 30-percent loss in purchasing power. In comparison, other wage and salary earners in the United States have on average modestly increased their purchasing power by about 1.5 percent since 1969.

This disparity has arisen precisely because Congress has been unable to approve smaller pay adjustments proposed by the Commission. Nor have they approved cost-of-living adjustments in each year. As a result, this time around the Commission proposed and former President Reagan endorsed a substantial increase to get back to 1969 purchasing power.

The Commission also concluded that when Federal salaries are raised that they be accompanied by a ban on honoraria. Many Members of Congress have supplemented their income by accepting honoraria of up to $2,000 per occasion for making a speech or attending a meeting or other event. Currently, Representatives may receive outside earned income, including honoraria, up to 30 percent [$26,850] of annual salary, while Senators may receive honoraria up to 40 percent [$35,800] of annual salary, with no percentage limit on other forms of outside earned income.

Lastly, I would like to touch on the point of whether it is a conflict of interest for Congress to vote on its own pay. Almost no worker in the United States has the authority to set his or her own salary; clearly this is a conflict of interest. By setting up an independent commission to make pay proposals, the 1967 Federal Salary Act sought to remove this conflcit. By doing so, I do not believe Congress was abrogating its accountability on this issue—I believe Members of Congress will be and should be held accountable when they face reelection. Every election year, Members still have to explain what happened and why they took the position they did on this issue—and our constituents will render the judgment.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, today we vote for the bill to disapprove the pay raise, but the debate over proper compensation for top Federal officials and the process for determining that compensation will stay with us. Congress set up a system to deal with this explosive subject, and we are going to have to review whether we keep this system or adopt another.

Mr. MARLENEE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to applaud the leadership of the House of Representatives for at last bowing to common sense by giving Members the opportunity today to reject this outrageous pay raise proposal.

In my opinion, the mere fact that we are having a vote restores credibility to Congress, and I believe a majority of my collegues will joint me in voting down this pay raise.

The Federal Government should be run no differently than a business—no business manager would expect to see his or her paycheck fattened at a time when the business is running in the red. The Federal budget deficit is so high that the threat of increasing taxes is very real, and it would be a slap in the face of the American taxpayer if Congress were to let this pay raise proposal become a reality.

The threat of raising taxes comes at a time when the people of the State I represent are losing jobs, veterans benefits are being slashed, and the economy of Montana is in difficult straits.

What's needed now is for Congress to cut spending, not raise it, and I urge my colleagues to join with me in voting against this pay raise and cosponsoring legislation for a constitutionally balanced budget and a bill giving the President a line-item veto to trim the budget fat. Only by enacting this legislation can Congress truly rein in spending and prevent future spending boondoggles that further burden the American taxpayer.

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, the House will receive today a long overdue opportunity to express its views on the proposed pay increase. While I appreciate the opportunity to vote on a pay increase, I feel that the timing for a pay raise proposal could not have been worse. At a time when our Nation faces a huge budget deficit and little agreement on how to reduce that deficit, the public is justified in questioning our priorities.

The proposed pay raise for Members of Congress has resulted in a public outcry of opposition unlike any I have witnessed since being elected to Congress. The pros and cons of a congressional pay raise have been hotly debated in editorials, in letters to newspapers, on talk shows, and where ever people get together across the country. Ironically, until today, the Congress itself has been denied the opportunity to debate the matter.

It is clear from opinion polls that the American public shares my opposition to the manner in which the congressional pay raise issue has been presented. In the past month I have received hundreds of telephone calls and letters from irate Rhode Islanders in opposition to what they see as not only an unwarranted pay increase but also a roundabout and self-serving implementation of that pay raise.

The Constitution provides an explicit requirement that the Congress set its own pay. The possible conflict of interest in this provision is balanced by the fact that Members of Congress have a responsibility to provide a forthright defense of their vote on the floor of the House. Today we are given that opportunity to cast our vote and be held accountable.

Mr. Speaker, the matter of a pay raise has been muddled with a variety of other issues. I feel that the American public deserves to have these issues clearly separated and debated in advance. If receiving honoraria is inappropriate, then that issue should be considered as part of a package of reforms. If restrictions should be placed on outside income of any other type, that question should also be dabated. If congressional performance on such serious issues as deficit reduction is not acceptable, then perhaps we should entertain an approach such as Representative ROSTENKOWSKI's pay for performance proposal. Under any circumstances, I feel that the responsibilities of Members of Congress, Federal judges and high level civil servants deserve pay adequate to attract the very best talent in the Nation.

For Members of Congress, the public retains the opportunity to decide every 2 years whether or not we earn our pay. The pay of those who chose public service should represent a positive incentive for potential future members. The public interest can be well served by passing a law that prohibits Congress from receiving a pay raise until after an election has intervened. I have cosponsored such a bill because I feel that ultimately the voters should select representatives who are the best available and who are worth the salary set by law.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House was provided with an opportunity to vote on the congressional pay raise. I urge my colleagues to join me in a calling for the full consideration of the entire package of issues that surround appropriate pay and restrictions on outside income for Members of Congress, Federal judges and top level civil servants.

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, this is a great day for democracy, the American people, and the U.S. Congress. While we may disagree among ourselves over the 50-percent salary increase, it's clear that the American people demanded that we go on record and be accountable to the constituents we represent. When allowed to vote, I believe Congress will vote the will of the people.

I commend Speaker WRIGHT for giving us a yea/nay vote on the entire 50-percent increase.

President Bush has stated that he's committed to ensuring that his administration is within the pale of propriety. There is also growing support in Congress to improve our code of ethics. I encourage my colleagues to reaffirm the principles set forth by James Madison, "it is essential to liberty that the Government in general should have a common interest with the people, so it is particularly essential that the branch of it under consideration should have an immediate dependence upon, and an intimate sympathy with, the people . . . there is a seeming impropriety in leaving any set of men without control to put their hand into the public coffers, to take out money to put into their pockets," by cosponsoring H.R. 149.

H.R. 149 would require a recorded vote on all future congressional pay raises, require that an election to Congress intervene prior to the raise taking effect, and tie all future increases to the previous year's cost-of-living adjustment for Social Security, at least until the time when we resolve the Federal deficit problem. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting H.R. 149.

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, it seems only fitting that on one of the first days of the bicentennial session of Congress, we have the opportunity to cast a vote which both reestablishes our faith in democracy and carries on the tradition of representative government that our Founding Fathers envisioned.

It is indeed a rare occurrence that a group as diverse as the American public is so united in its opposition to a single issue.

The constituents of Colorado's Sixth District, who I represent, have spoken. They have let me know by a ratio of 1,000 to 3 that they are adamantly opposed to the recommendation for a 50-percent increase in executive, legislative, and judicial salaries.

Who can blame them. For several years now we have been asking the American taxpayer to make financial sacrifies in the name of deficit reduction. However, Congress did not heed its own advice. Instead, it continued spending money at a record level, creating a national debt of nearly $3 trillion.

The real problem, however, is not only that this increase is excessive, but that Members may be awarded raises without even casting a single vote.

As representatives of the people, we must not allow this to happen. We must lead not by default but by example. We in this body have an obligation to the people we represent. They have the right to know how their legislators stand no matter how controversial the issue. That is why several colleagues and I signed a letter to the Speaker requesting that a vote on the 50-percent raise take place.

While I hope today's vote is a step in the right direction it is only the first step. We cannot merely vote this raise down and say we've done our job. We have a long way to go toward reforming the current system used to determine Members' salary. We must insist that any measure proposing a raise for Congress be considered as a separate piece of legislation and that it not go into effect until after the next election. That a recorded vote be taken and that we deal with each issue upfront and in the open.

The American people have grown weary of the legislative tricks and games that are so often played in Washington. They want a Member who truly believes in the vote he or she casts. They want someone who represent the interests of his or her constituency. That is what democracy is, what our Founding Fathers envisioned, and what the people of this great country deserve.

Today we have the opportunity to show the American people that representative government really works. Let's not waste it. I urge my colleagues to vote no on the pay raise.

Mr. McCANDLESS. Mr. Speaker, the issue before us is straightforward. Unless we pass the pending resolution, a 51-percent pay increase for Members of Congress will go into effect at midnight. It is important to note that, because of the procedure, a "yes" in favor of the resolution, is a vote against the pay raise.

At a time when we are struggling to reduce the Federal deficit; at a time when we are asking our constituents to share in the efforts necessary to control Federal spending; at a time when some in Congress are calling for a tax increase—it is absurd to increase congressional salaries by 51 percent. This proposed raise is ill-timed, ill-advised, and is simply not consistent with the leadership Congress should demonstrate in the effort to move toward a balanced Federal budget. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this resolution, and against the pay raise.

Some have argued that the proposed salary increase is necessary to attract qualified candidates for public office. I disagree. It is an honor and a privilege to serve in Congress, and there does not seem to be a shortage in the number of people willing to run for office at the current salary. Nor does there seem to be a limit on the people willing to serve in the executive branch.

For that reason, I introduced legislation very similar to the resolution that is before us now. My legislation would have blocked the pay increase for Members of Congress and members of the executive branch, but would have allowed the proposed pay increase to go into effect for Federal judges. The rationale for the distinction is simple. Our Founders did not envision the creation of "professional" politicians and bureaucrats. However, under the Constitution, Federal judges are expected to spend their career on the bench and serve for life. Consequently, to attract, and to keep highly qualified individuals from the lucrative practice of law to serve on the Federal bench, we must adequately compensate our judges. Congress should review this issue in the coming months.

I strongly supported the efforts to bring the issue of the pay raise to a vote. The current process, which allows pay raises to be proposed after the election, and then allows raises to go into effect without a vote, is wrong, and must be changed. Therefore, in the near future, I will introduce legislation which will: First, require salary increases to be proposed before an election; second, prohibit any proposed pay raise from going into effect unless approved by both the House and Senate by recorded votes; and third, delay any approved pay raise from going into effect until after the next congressional election. This process would take the much needed step of making Congress more accountable to the people.

In the meantime, we should, and we must, support this resolution and reject the proposed 51-percent pay raise.

Mr. KYL. Mr. Speaker, I applaud House Speaker JIM WRIGHT for his announcement yesterday that an up-or-down vote on the pay raise will occur today. As I have indicated to my constituents since the Quadrennial Commission first issued its recommendation last December, I will vote to disapprove the pay raise.

The Speaker's announcement yesterday clearly was prompted by the tremendous outpouring of the American people on the issue. No matter how you feel about the pay raise, one can only marvel at this spectacle of democracy in action. The people spoke, and we responded.

But Mr. Speaker, the issue doesn't end here, with a simple up-or-down vote today. The American people have also spoken loud and clear on the issue of honoraria, and the ability of Members of Congress elected before 1980 to keep unspent campaign funds when they leave office. They also do not approve of the way pay raises can take effect without a vote of the Congress.

The degree to which the American people opposed this pay raise strongly suggests how they feel about the institution, the Congress of the United States. It also strongly suggests that we must do much more to earn their respect. By following through on a ban on speaking fees paid by special interest groups, requiring up-or-down votes on future pay raises, and eliminating the "grandfather clause" on the use of unspent campaign funds, we can take a giant step in that direction.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort. The people demand no less.

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to make known my opposition to the congressional pay raise. Due to recent hip surgery, I was unable to cast my vote today. Had I been present, however, I would have cast a "yes" vote in favor of the resolution which disapproves the pay raise recommendations of the Quadrennial Commission. I am strongly opposed to a 50-percent increase in pay, particularly when so many in our Nation are forced to make ends meet on much smaller incomes. Additionally, given the country's present economic situation, I feel the Congress must make every effort to curtail extra expenditures and act in a fiscally responsible manner. I have opposed pay raises in the past and will continue to stand firm on this issue.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I think an important fact which may have been overlooked in this debate is the role which the public has played in the outcome. We often call this "the people's House," and today I think it is clear that this House does belong to the American people, and not to any one person or faction.

On January 3, when I introduced House Joint Resolution 56 disapproving the pay increase, I was frankly not too optimistic about our chances of blocking the raise—especially when it became clear that there was a plan to keep the House out of regular session, in an obvious attempt to prevent this vote. But we are not sent here to sit on our hands, Mr. Speaker, we were sent here to represent our constituents, and the way we do that is to vote, so the fact that we are here in session today, debating this very issue, is testimony to the fact that in this House, the people do rule.

But we should not let this issue rest with the vote that will be taken here today. We need to reform the procedure by which Congress sets its pay. And the best way to do that is to do what James Madison first proposed to this body 200 years ago, and that is to make it clear that no sitting Congress should raise its own pay. Madison's amendment, which was proposed as part of the original Bill of Rights, is still very much alive today—in fact, 25 States have not ratified it. On January 3, I also introduced House Joint Resolution 55, which embodies the Madison amendment. It says that no pay raise may take effect until after an intervening election. If we really feel we are worth more, we should have the guts to say so and then stand for election with that fact made plain.

We also have to separate pay for ourselves, from that of the executive and judiciary. It is wrong to hold them hostage. Let's make this vote today a tribute to the foresight of James Madison. Let's vote this raise down, and then vote to reform the method. The American people deserve no less.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am voting in favor of raising the pay of Congressmen because I think 535 vice presidents of the largest corporation in the world, who make life and death decisions affecting people all over the world, deserve to be paid at the level recommended by the Commission.

Even with this 51-percent increase, congressional pay will remain below the level of $143,000, which would be the amount of pay Congressmen would receive if congressional pay had kept pace with inflation.

Despite the stampede atmosphere created by the media the public should be reminded that this pay raise is the recommendation of an objective commission and was approved by the most popular President in recent history, as well as by the incoming President.

It is unfortunate that a mob hysteria has been generated over a matter which will have no significant impact on the overall budget for fiscal year 1990. Meanwhile, this diversionary headline-grabber has taken the attention of the American people away from the real budget-busting monster on the agenda of the Congress. The savings and loan association scandal represents a $90-billion swindle which will paralyze the national budget for the next 4 years.

There will be no money to invest in educational reform, job training, or better health care. This savings and loan association ripoff constitutes the greatest and most brazen scandal in the history of the Nation.

We are being plunged into socialism for the banking industry in order to compensate for the misdeeds of incompetents and criminals. The failing savings and loan institutions are a network of racketeering enterprises which operated for a long time in collusion with certified public accountants and Government regulators.

I am pleased to vote "yes" on a much-needed pay raise in order to get the matter off the agenda and allow the American people to focus on the $90-billion swindle, which is of far greater importance to their lives and the lives of their grandchildren.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, the vote we are about to take and the actions leading up to it, highlight the drastic need to reform the system under which congressional salaries are determined. I am pleased that we finally have the opportunity to vote openly and on the record in opposition to this raise.

The recommended increase for Members of Congress from $89,500 to $135,000 can only be called excessive in the face of the budget deficit this Congress was elected to deal with. When we appropriate 4 percent increases for civil service and military employees, and grant our retirees inflation-rate COLA's, it is impossible to justify a 50-percent raise for ourselves.

The public outcry on this issue has come from all segments of our society, and it has not just been over the size of the increase recommended by the Quadrennial Commission. I have heard from literally hundreds of constituents, and many of them tell me they wouldn't necessarily object to the increase itself, as long as it was voted on. In letters, phone calls, and at town meetings across the Second District last month, I heard the same thing. If Congress wants a raise, why are they going about it in such a underhanded manner? If they think they deserve one, why not vote on it? I have had a hard time answering why Congress does not want to be held accountable for its actions to the very people who put them in office.

The response to our actions, or rather inaction, up to this time, emphasizes the need to act now to reform our system. We must make changes which allow us to be straightforward with our constituents. The rules of the House must be changed to require a separate, recorded vote on any proposal, whether it is legislative in nature or a recommendation from the executive branch, which would change the salary for Congress. Also, such changes in salary, if approved, should not take effect until the beginning of the next Congress. Changes in the President's income are by law prospective. Why should Congress be any different?

We were sent here to represent the people in our districts. For their trust in our ability to make the choices on the tough issues, we owe them this vote. I just hope it hasn't come to late to restore that trust.

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to the proposed 50 percent pay raise for top Government officials. The recommendations of the President's Commission on Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Salaries would raise the salary of Federal judges and Members of Congress to $135,000, and would raise the salaries of Cabinet members to $155,000.

In an era of huge budget deficits and the resulting pressure to cut Federal spending, a 50-percent pay raise is at best ill-timed and most certainly sends the wrong signal to the American public that top elected and appointed officials are not willing to share the burden of deficit reduction.

My constituents in the Fifth Congressional District of Alabama, like Americans all across the country, have sent a very genuine and very strong message of disapproval of the pay Commission's proposals. They have also expressed an overwhelming desire that the Congress, by recorded vote, approve any pay increases for top Government officials just as we do for other employees of the Federal Government and for beneficiaries of Federal programs. It is a basic question of Congress' accountability to the people who elect us and I wholeheartedly agree that we should vote on any pay increase.

As a cosponsor of H.R. 533, a bill that would abolish the Federal Pay Commission, require a recorded vote on any future pay increases, and delay the implementation of any pay raise for Members of Congress to the next term, I believe the current system is flawed and should be changed permanently.

What we have seen over the past few days and months is the kind of grassroots democracy that our forefathers envisioned in setting up a House of Representatives, elected every 2 years, that would be more sensitive to the wishes of the people. The people have spoken—loud and clear—and their voices have been heard.

Mr. McMILLEN of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I'd like to echo the opposition heard today to the proposed pay raise. Hundreds of calls and letters have flooded my office objecting to the pay raise and the same has occurred at offices all over Capitol Hill.

Like many of my constituents, I object to the size of the raise at a time when our Nation is facing the most serious budget deficit in history. The public is demanding a public vote on this subject and that's exactly what we should do.

Raises of this sort need to be approached in the same manner as other Government expenditures. Other Federal workers, State workers, and Social Security recipients receive a cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] every year to cover the rise in inflation. In past years, Congress exempted itself from the COLA's, which led to the Quadrenniel Commission's recommendation of a large, lump-sum increase.

Senators and Representatives should be treated as any other civil servant, with their salaries rising with the inflation rate. If any raise is to be considered above that, it should be tied to legislative achievements, such as reducing the Federal deficit.

The salaries for judges, however, need to be addressed immediately. Our inaction in this area has caused a crisis in the judicial branch. Between 1958 and 1973 only 6 Federal judges resigned from the bench. From 1974 to the present that number rose to 57. It's clear that people with decades of experience as judges are not going to accept the salary of entry-level lawyer. This is a legitimate public policy concern that should be addressed by Congress.

Congress needs to reform the Federal pay system to prevent more dedicated judges and civil servants from fleeing to the private sector.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, let me say to my colleagues that the Quadrennial Commission report recommendation is before us. The item that we will be voting on today would turn down that recommendation of increase in pay for high levels of the administration, for judges, and for Members of Congress.

So much ink has been spilled and so many hands have been self-righteously wrung over this topic in recent weeks that it is time to complete this cynical exercise.

Since the founding of this great Republic, Washington has tied itself in knots every few years trying to evade the inevitable conflicts of interest in setting Federal salaries.

In this circumstance we are dealing with the Quadrennial Commission report that suggested a certain level of pay. At the same time that report suggested that we consider eliminating honoraria or outside income. I think it is important for the public to understand that the proposal would have done 2 things: Establish this level of pay, but, beyond that, take approximately half of that level of that pay away by eliminating outside special interest income.

In recent years I personally have become very concerned and uneasy with the honoraria process, and it is time for us to address that matter. But we are not going to reduce Members pay as a result. It is very important that Members recognize that if, in the future, we are to attract the kind of quality personnel we need in the House to meet the major challenges we face, indeed we must pay at a level that will attract the best that is available for public service. In this instance I am afraid we are walking away from that responsibility.

It is very clear that the vote today will be overwhelming to reject the Commission's report. It is the result of a public furor that may not completely understand the needs and demands of the House.

Mr. Speaker, today the House is responding to the voice of the people and the public it serves.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to close in the brief time that is available.

A number of Members have come to me and asked: "Where do we go from here?" As I said at the beginning, perhaps it is time for some new initiatives. A new and bipartisan consensus must emerge. I think we are going to have to look to the bully pulpit, the man in the White House, to help us in that regard.

I hope the Members will keep in mind this debate when we come to the issue of cost-of-living adjustments this year. We have missed 12 out of the last 19, and had we taken those as they came along, we would not be in the position of needing a Quadrennial Commission to repair the damage we do to ourselves.

So let us keep in mind the opportunities we will have in not too many months to show the new courage that seems to come now from those who are about to vote against their pay raise.

I think we also ought to keep in mind that we need to spend more time talking about this together in a place where we can be honest with each other, and I do not know of any better place than the well of the House.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY], who has been a leader in this area for many years, has taken a special order out today. For those Members who want a cathartic outlet, perhaps some of us might avail ourselves of this opportunity. I intend to take other special orders also, because it is not enough for Members simply to be critics of the system in place and to ask for recorded votes when we know in fact they have rarely if ever worked in the past. We need Members on both sides of the aisle, our leaders along with the rank and file, to find a solution to this terrible crisis that we are doing nothing more than exacerbating today.

Let us put all the rhetoric aside. This is really a tragedy, and the only way we can resolve it is by having the kind of courage to act on our own issues with the same kind of courage that too often is lacking in this body on every important national issue. The Members who have the guts to stand up on this issue are often the leaders on every other crucial issue, and we appreciate them all the more today than ever before.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] has expired.

All time has expired.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO] that the House suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 129).

The question was taken.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 380, nays 48, not voting 4, as follows:

RESIGNATION AS MANAGER IN THE MATTER OF IMPEACHMENT TRIAL OF JUDGE ALCEE L. HASTINGS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable DON EDWARDS, Member of Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, January 26, 1989.

Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
The Speaker, U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The time constraints connected with the impeachment inquiry of Judge Walter Nixon, which is being handled by the subcommittee I chair, will make it most difficult for me to serve as a Manager on the part of the House for the Senate trial of Judge Hastings.

I therefore respectfully request that I be excused from further service as Manager for the Hastings Senate trial.

Thank you for your many courtesies.

Sincerely,

DON EDWARDS.

IN THE MATTER OF THE IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE ALCEE L. HASTINGS

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I offer two privileged resolutions (H. Res. 69 and H. Res. 70), and I ask unanimous consent that they be considered en bloc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

H. RES. 69

Resolved, That the House excuses Mr. Edwards of California from serving as a manager for the trial of the impeachment of Alcee L. Hastings, judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, and appoints Mr. Synar to serve as a manager in that trial.

H. RES. 70

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform the Senate that Mr. Edwards of California is excused from serving as a manger for the trial of the impeachment of Alcee L. Hastings, judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, and that Mr. Snyar has been appointed to serve as a manager in that trial.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BROOKS] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS], has asked to be excused from service as manager on the part of the House for the impeachment trial of Judge Alcee Hastings in the Senate.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS] will be presiding over another impeachment inquiring concerning Judge Walter Nixon.

In order to permit him the necessary time to undertake that onerous task, I believe that the House should grant his request. The two resolutions before the House excuse the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS] from further service as a manager on the impeachment of Judge Hastings, appoint the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SYNAR] as manager in his stead, and authorize a message to be sent to the Senate informing it of those two actions.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield such time as he may consume to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GEKAS], a member of the committee.

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the chairman and his yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I simply wanted to place on the record that we have no objection, of course, to the removal of Mr. EDWARDS at his request because of his already designated duties. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SNYAR], who is the substituted manager, was present during the hearings, was a member of the subcommittee at the beginning and at the end, and during the entire proceedings of the impeachment hearings, and he is well-suited to continue the work of the gentleman from California [Mr. EDWARDS] as a manager.

Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the entire two resolutions.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, reclaiming my time, I urge adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolutions.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolutions were agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MILITARY FAMILIES APPREHENSIVE OVER USER FEES PROPOSAL AT MILITARY HOSPITALS

(Mr. PICKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, when President Bush outlines his revisions to the proposed budget on Thursday, America's military families will be watching to see whether he rejects the Reagan administration's proposal for a pilot program of user fees at military hospitals and clinics for nonactive-duty beneficiaries.

If approved, these fees would come at a time when our military and their dependents have already endured a marked decline in their access to health care. For thousands who seek care at military treatment facilities, long waiting periods have become the norm. For others, care simply is not available. Military families have been required with increasing frequency to obtain their medical care under the Champus program, which means they pay a part of the cost from their modest family incomes. This, I remind you, is for a benefit promised to them without charge when they enlisted.

Many problems in the military health care system are—with the help of Congress—now moving toward a solution. User fees are not a part of that solution. They will only hamper morale, recruitment, and retention in our military services.

Mr. Speaker, America's military families know a duck when they see one. They know a tax when they see one of those too.

This proposal for a user fee at military medical treatment facilities is a tax, and I hope our President will strike it out of his version of the 1990 budget.

FAIR CREDIT REPORTING ACT REQUIREMENT

(Mr. SHAW asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing a bill today that will protect consumers by ensuring that they are notified quickly about any adverse credit information pending against them.

This will protect victims of computer error, and enable consumers who do have problems with their credit to take necessary steps to improve their status before applying for further credit.

The bill would, very simply, require credit bureaus and agencies within 30 days to fully disclose to consumers any adverse information received about the consumer. The disclosure must be in writing and at no charge.

There have been too many instances in which law abiding citizens with strong credit ratings find out only when they apply for a mortgage or car loan that negative and often false credit information is on the books.

PAY ISSUE SETTLED—TIME TO MOVE ON TO OTHER ISSUES

(Mr. PENNY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, you have had a tough few weeks and you lost a tough vote yesterday—but you did the right thing in scheduling today a vote on the pay raise issue.

Needless to say, this has been a contentious issue. It's important to remember that a Republican President recommended this pay raise and then left town. Then, our new Republican President gave only mild approval to the pay hike—even though it was his administration and judicial appointees who stood to benefit from the increase. And so, by and large—you and the Democrats were left to bear the brunt of public opposition to a Republican pay raise proposal.

I disagreed with the pay increase plan and the strategy of avoiding a recorded vote on the matter until after the fact. But while we held different positions on this issue—I trust your motivation was simply to do what you felt was right for the institution of Congress. Also, I know you felt a majority of the membership agreed with your position. Yet, yesterday most Members voted the other way.

In acknowledging the will of the majority—your remarks yesterday demonstrated a trait lacking in many—generosity. That kind gesture did not go unnoticed.

The vote today has settled this divisive issue. Let's move on—we have other work to do.

INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION CONCERNING MINE REMOVAL IN AFGHANISTAN

(Mr. BUECHNER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to note the imminent withdrawal of the remaining Soviet military forces from Afghanistan. Those of us who have followed the tragic course of this conflict the last 8 years welcome this withdrawal.

I am certain that the mothers and fathers of Soviet soldiers will breathe a sigh of relief when the last son safely crosses the Afghan border and leaves the war behind. However, although the Soviet Army will be gone, the war will not be over. Even when the last shot is fired there will remain a tragic reminder of the Soviets' presence in the millions of unexploded mines deployed during this conflict.

Although many of us may be familiar with the many different kinds of mines, one particular type deserves special attention—the plastic mines. Plastic mines come in various sizes and shapes, and are impervious to conventional metal detection methods. Unfortunately, since these mines have often been disguised to look like toys, they have taken their greatest toll on the Afghan children.

Imagine, if you will, millions of dolls, cars, butterflies, and other bright baubles designed as playthings to attract the attention of children. However, in Afghanistan these are the toys of the Devil's playground. They bring no joy, but inflict pain on the most innocent members of Afghan society. According to published accounts, thousands of young Afghans have lost limbs, and many have been killed. With an estimated 3 million refugees slated to begin returning, this problem will only worsen.

To call attention to this problem, today, I am introducing a resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that the Soviet Union should not leave Afghanistan without recognizing that these mines are—and will remain—a serious threat to the Afghan people. Further, it calls upon the Soviet Union to provide all necessary assistance to alleviate this problem

I welcome your support of this resolution.

DEFICIT REDUCTION

(Mrs. LLOYD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, we have now as a body rejected the 51-percent pay raise. I believe that the American people deserve a full accounting from the House of Representatives on the pay raise proposal, and I do want to thank the Speaker for letting the will of the people prevail and scheduling a vote on this sensitive issue.

Mr. Speaker, we are at a critical time in our Nation's history. The Federal budget deficit has been cited time and time again as the overriding concern of the public, while at the same time substantial Federal expenditures are increasingly being requested for such proposals as education, health care, housing, the needs of our elderly, and the scientific community. As Members of Congress we are obligated to achieve further, substantial deficit reduction and a measured response to these funding needs.

In order to meet that end, Mr. Speaker, we must make sacrifices and tighten our belts. Let us start right here at home and show the American people that we are willing and able to do our part and work together for the good of our country, and hold the line on Federal spending and meet our deficit reduction goals.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO EXTEND AUTHORITY TO NEGOTIATE STEEL TRADE AGREEMENTS

(Mr. REGULA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REGULA. Mr. Speaker, today I join my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania, JOHN MURTHA, in introducing legislation which will extend authority to the President to maintain and negotiate steel trade agreements under the VRA Program for another 5 years.

I won't elaborate on the successes of the VRA except to say that America's steel industry has become one of the most competitive and productive producers in the world. Our industry requires 8 to 14 percent fewer manhours to produce a ton of steel than any other major producing country.

Opponents of the measure cite problems with short supply and price. They argue we don't need an extension based on the recent successes of the industry. This is a mistake.

Conditions within the international marketplace have not improved. For example, despite stagnant demand for steel worldwide, South Korea is expanding it's production capacity from 8.5 million metric tons in 1982 to an estimated 17.2 million metric tons by 1991. Without VRA restrictions South Korea could be expected to increase exports to the west coast by 350,000 to 500,000 tons. This would mean a reduction in revenues of about $184 million to domestic companies and a loss of over 600 jobs.

Clearly, any extension of the program, should look closely at the problems of short supply and price. The VRA concept was not designed in a growth market environment and certain modifications should be made to allow market flexibility for both the domestic purchaser and producers. These mechanisms are receiving close scrutiny and I am confident actions will be taken to make the VRA's market responsive.

I strongly urge you to join me and the leadership of the Congressional Steel Caucus in support of this important legislation.

BUDGET FOR THE VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

(Mr. JONTZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, this morning the House Veterans' Affairs Committee heard testimony on the budget for the new Cabinet level Veterans Department.

The budget situation we have at the present time with the VA is rapidly approaching disaster. The VA's own Department of Medicine and Surgery has calculated their budget shortfall for the current year is $635 million and for fiscal 1990 the proposed budget is $1.2 billion short of what is necessary even to deliver the current level of services.

Mr. Speaker, what this means is that without some improvements in the budget our Nation is not going to be able to meet its obligations to the men and women who have fought to defend our country and keep it the strongest and the freest Nation in the world.

I endorse the independent budget which has been prepared by several of the veterans' organizations to correct the deficiencies in the budget submitted by President Reagan. I urge all of my colleagues to work with the veterans' organizations, the Veterans' Committee, the Budget Committee and the Appropriations Committees to see that the VA has the resources it needs to keep our commitment to the veterans who have made America No. 1.

SENSE OF CONGRESS RESOLUTION REGARDING NEGOTIATED POLITICAL SETTLEMENT IN EL SALVADOR

(Ms. PELOSI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution which would express the sense of Congress that the United States should pursue a negotiated political settlement to the civil war in El Salvador.

After 9 years, 3 billion U.S. taxpayer dollars, and 70,000 deaths, even military experts are now saying that a military solution to this war cannot be achieved. The Salvadoran opposition have recently broken ground by presenting a proposal which, real or not, opens opportunities for dialog. The Bush administration has expressed a willingness to reconsider the policy of unconditional support for El Salvador which characterized the Reagan years. The Vice President delivered a message to Salvadoran officials that the administration is concerned about human rights and a growing congressional dissatisfaction with recent violent trends could endanger American aid.

These changes in tone by two major players in Salvador—the guerrillas and the United States—provide a unique opportunity to turn United States policy around. The need for immediate negotiations to end the civil war is urgent—death squad activities are on the rise, and the increasing strength and political presence of the right-wing arena party do not bode well for peace and justice for Salvadorans.

My resolution urges the Bush administration to take advantage of the opportunity for negotiations to end this tragic war. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1989

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today, it adjourn to meet at 11 a.m. on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DARDEN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

U.S.-U.S.S.R. TRADE, THE JACKSON-VANIK AMENDMENT, AND THE BEGINNING OF THE DIALOG

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DARDEN). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a statement by Congressman BILL FRENZEL and myself regarding United States trade with the Soviet Union. I've also submitted a recent statement made by former Representative Charles Vanik regarding the Jackson-Vanik amendment, and the statement of the Union of Councils for Soviet Jews on the Stevenson amendment.

United States-Soviet trade involves many important considerations. However, with the warming of our two nations' relations, its time for the dialog to begin.

JOINT STATEMENT OF CONGRESSMEN BILL FRENZEL AND PETE STARK

TIME TO BEGIN THE DEBATE ON IMPROVING TRADE RELATIONS WITH THE SOVIET UNION

Few Westerners are able to make reliable analyses of perestroika and glasnost, nor can they predict the exact course and speed of changes now taking place in the U.S.S.R. Some of the manifestations of those changes, however, like the INF Treaty, the promised withdrawal from Afghanistan, and the breakthroughs in Africa are too significant to be ignored.

The changes appear to be real, and fundamental. It would be unwise to assume they are irreverisble, or that all changes will be beneficial to the rest of the world. Nevertheless, there seems to be an increasing chance that new directions and new attitudes in the U.S.S.R. can lead to the attainment of goals sought by the West over the past 40 years.

One of those goals has been improving human rights in the U.S.S.R. One particular aspect of human rights, that of free emigration, has been of such significant concern that it has been linked to U.S.-U.S.S.R. commercial relationships through the Jackson-Vanik amendment to U.S. Trade law.

Jackson-Vanik denies normal trading status to the U.S.S.R. because of its refusal to recognize rights of free emigration for its citizens. Its effect is that Soviet products entering the United States carry a premium price, because the special tariff adds about one-third to the value of the goods. The U.S.S.R. has long complained about this tariff treatment, considering Jackson-Vanik an unreasonable intrusion into its internal affairs.

The magnitude of change in the U.S.S.R. suggests that an accomodation of the emigration problem might somehow be achieved. As the cultural, scientific, and even security exchanges between the two countries increase, both Nations ought to be getting ready to discuss free emigration and trade expansion as well.

The improvement in East-West relationships is fact. The U.S. ought to find new ways to move the process along. One way is to consider how a return to normal trade relations might be possible.

The goal is basic human rights for all people, normal trading relations, and increased economic activity. That goal will most likely be gained in small steps. What will be required is that the U.S. have sufficient negotiating flexibility to take advantage of what seem to be promising opportunities.

Even if a big trade agreement came soon, businessmen cannot expect a bonanza. Trade financing would remain a problem, and high-volume trade will ultimately require the liberation of the Ruble.

Because the economic and human rights gains are expected to come slowly, there is all the more reason to start the process now. The 101st Congress and the new administration should lead the debate. It is time for the national dialogue to begin.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES A. VANIK

In the next several weeks, I understand that the National Conference on Soviet Jewry and its constituent agencies will be considering what action to take on a possible extension of a waiver of the Jackson-Vanik amendment for the benefit of the Soviet Union. Immigration levels appear to be moving to the 38,000 to 43,000 range annualized. More significantly, the Soviets have indicated that they intend an early codification of all laws restricting immigration, religious activities and customs.

The Soviet Jews have led the struggle for freedom of religion and culture. The agonies of this effort are bringing fruitful benefits to millions of Soviet citizens who live in many provinces and worship in many religions.

In the course of your deliberations, I hope that your group will take the initiative in deciding whether a waiver of Jackson-Vanik is appropriate in view of the current developments in the Soviet Union.

There are many in America who urge that the Jackson-Vanik amendment be repealed, drastically amended, or provide for a five-year waiver.

I believe the language of Jackson-Vanik is in concrete, stronger in the commitment of the American people than it was in 1974. I have urged American businssmen, who depend on long periods of commercial stability, to place their support behind a waiver under the law instead of a repeal of Jackson-Vanik or a major amendment. I told them that Jackson-Vanik should not be changed in substance.

It is my hope that your initiative and support of a waiver would encourage developments in the Soviet Union which are currently underway.

UCSJ SUPPORTS REPEAL OF STEVENSON AMENDMENT, PENDING SOVIET PERFORMANCE

WASHINGTON, D.C.—The Union of Councils for Soviet Jews disclosed their decision to support a repeal of the Stevenson amendment pending increased Soviet performance, said UCSJ national director Micah H. Naftalin in a news conference today. This proposal was previously presented to high level officials of the Soviet foreign ministry by Naftalin and UCSJ national president Pamela B. Cohen at the time of the June summit in Moscow.

"If Jewish emigration reaches 30-35,000 in 1989, as predicted, and if the institutional reforms and evacuation of all long-term Refusenik cases are accomplished, consistent with the Helsinki Final Act and Concluding Vienna Document, as promised, we would agree to a repeal of the Stevenson amendment should the administration and the Congress seek it," said Naftalin.

The 1974 Stevenson amendment controls trade credits to the Soviets prohibiting U.S. agencies from making loans in excess of $300 million to the Soviets without Congress's approval. A repeal of the amendment would signal to the Soviets a measured concession and encouragement of further progress, explained Naftalin.

"We have long held to a policy based on a flexible, measured response to improvements in Soviet Jewish emigration. 1988 saw significant progress. Jewish imigration reached 19,343, with 3,652 in December alone, the highest monthly total since 1980. As a result, in recent weeks, the U.S. has made major concessions to the Soviets, providing them both with an agreement to host a 1991 International Human Rights Conference in Moscow and with an economic conference in Bonn in 1989, which the Soviets also wanted.

"Consistent with a step-by-step approach, if the above conditions are met, we would agree to a Stevenson amendment repeal as an intermediary step to Jackson-Vanik," he continued, referring to the Jackson-Vanik "freedom of emigration" amendment to the Trade Act of 1974, which denies the Soviets "Most Favored Nation" (MFN) status. "However, it is vital that we withhold playing the Jackson-Vanik card—the most important remaining concession—until Soviet promises are converted into actual performance," he continued.

"Jackson-Vanik is the statutory centerpiece of the Soviet Jewish emigration movement," said Naftalin. "Nowhere else in law is there explicit linkage between Soviet achievement of 'high and sustained' emigration and United States granting the Soviets MFN status. Yet performances on promises must be monitored and verified before additional concessions are made. The traditional benchmark for waiving Jackson-Vanik and granting a one-year concession of MFN is an annual level of Jewish exit permits of 50,000-60,000. When the institutionalized reforms are put into place, if they are consistent with international guarantees, there should be no question that these numbers will be forthcoming," he concluded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

[Mr. ANNUNZIO addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

AMERICAN HERITAGE TRUST ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. UDALL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, in 1988 I introduced the American Heritage Trust Act for the first time. I said then that this legislation—to give future generations the chance to save and to hold the open spaces and historic places so vital to the life of the country—was no less important than any of the great environmental landmarks it has been my privilege to see Congress enact in the past quarter century.

I must confess that last March I foresaw a long, uphill struggle of many years before the American Heritage Trust might be realized. But now it is clear that this concept's time has come. In the 100th Congress, H.R. 4127 gained 235 bipartisan cosponsors in the House and 40 in the Senate, remarkable numbers for legislation of this magnitude. More than 50 organizations have officially endorsed the bill—and not just the Sierra Club and Wilderness Society, but also the National Governors' Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures, the National Conference of Mayors, many other civic and conservation groups as well as innumerable locally elected and appointed officials, councils and boards.

During his campaign, President Bush endorsed the fundamental concept of the American Heritage Trust, which he called a national endowment for the environment.

More than anything, however, I think this idea's time has come because the realization is growing among Americans from every region and every walk of life that open spaces are disappearing at an alarming rate, that the facilities we need to provide recreation are inadequate and getting worse, that the historic structures that tell our story are crumbling way—and that we are running out of time to do something about it.

At the Federal, State, and local level there is an enormous reservoir of talent and energy ready to be put to this great task. All that is lacking are the resources and the national leadership necessary to spark what former Gov. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, Chairman of the President's Commission on Americans Outdoors, so aptly called the prairie fire of community activism.

Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that this legislation is the match that will light that prairie fire. In introducing it today, I would like to reiterate much of what I said last year, while adding a few observations about some of the changes we have made and some of the criticisms we have heard in the past months.

The trust I propose would be comprised of the existing land and water conservation fund and the historic preservation fund. Each would be established as real trust funds. By that I mean that their existing revenues will be invested in interest-bearing accounts to assure a steady and growing flow of money for the funds' purposes. In the near future, they will become self-financing and require no new Government revenues.

The basic thrust of both existing funds remains sound—revenues generated by our offshore oil and gas should be invested in permanent open space assets. But instead of lying idle in a Treasury envelope as they do now revenues would be put to work in permanent, interest-generating accounts. while the principal would never be spent, the yearly interest woud be—to purchase open space and provide recreational facilities across the board. When the interest generated each year is sufficient to meet the funds' purposes, new Federal money into a the fund stops—and the trust stabilizes.

In other words, by investing reasonable but substantial sums now and for a few years into the future, we can guarantee a continuing investment in the quality of everyday life throughout America that will be a permanent legacy for all future generations.

This is a bold but responsible idea whose time has come. It was recognized most recently by the President's Commission on Americans Outdoors. In 1987, after 1½ years of intense study, President Reagan's panel of distinguished Americans strongly urged that LWCF become a dedicated trust fund that would generate at least a billion dollars a year in outlays. It's important to remember that this was a conservative group of people. But they were swayed by the fund's overwhelming record of success and convinced of the even greater need for its expansion.

Their recommendation was preceded by a bill I introduced with Representative Manuel Lujan of New Mexico in 1984. Companion legislation was offered by Senator Howard Baker of Tennessee. The latter was the last bill introduced by Senator Baker. And he said that no other legislation he had sponsored "carried a greater moral imperative."

For a quarter century, LWCF has paid for many of the national parks, wildlife refuges, forests, and historic sites that so distinguish America and its natural heritage. It has been the only source of money to buy the critical and threatened lands needed to protect our Yellowstones and Yosemites. It will pay for the great parks and wildlife preserves of our future, especially our most important urban parks. But the backlog of land already identified but not yet acquired runs into the billions of dollars. Unless we start investing in these areas now, will be never make good on the promises we have made to the American people, and we will be asking them to pay more and more to acquire less and less.

But it is not just the big crown jewels, the Grand Canyons, the Yellowstones and the Grand Tetons, that I am worried about. I'm just as concerned about the little places that help make life meaningful in every community across America. Its that quiet spot along the banks of the river just outside of town where a couple of kids can sit and watch and dream. Its the park on the other side of town where a family can go on a weekend to relax, be together and enjoy themselves.

Its the field houses and basketball courts of an inner city where a kid can compete and maybe pick up a little guidance along the way. Its the historic old building in an industrial neighborhood that not only warehouses invaluable stories about the past but promises economic revitalization in the future. Where will we be, what kind of life will our children have, if we don't provide for these places?

Make no mistake about it, these places are being lost. That little boy or girl can't sit by the riverside because the bank is covered with condominiums or its been paved over for a highway. The neighborhood park is so run down its not the kind of place you take your family. Is there any question about the terrible state of recreation facilities in our inner cities?

Talk to most any mayor or Governor. Their States, counties, cities, and villages can't compete with the pace of private development and the escalation of land prices, construction and rehabilitation costs. If they can't compete, the motivation to plan and work aggressively to provide for these places withers. All of us in Congress know of towns in our districts that can't even maintain the parks they already have, much less plan for new places to meet growing population and demand. Many communities searching for a new economic identity see the commercial possibilities of that historic district but don't have the funds or expertise to make it happen.

The report of the President's Commission on Americans Outdoors cites the importance of rural landscapes, urban playing fields and gyms or suburban marinas and golf courses—not only to our physical and mental health, but also to the economic development, culture and liveability of our communities. It also is laced with urgent alarms about the inability of communities to plan, develop, and maintain these places.

But what if it was different? What if State and local governments knew they could rely on some substantial level of matching Federal grants to buy land and develop recreation facilities? I think such a commitment would spark what Gov. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, Chairman of the President's Commission, often called a prairie fire of local creativity and activism to conserve the open spaces they care about and develop the facilities they need.

Lets say I'm a local official and I can see that 5 years from now that river corridor or that wooded area or that large block of private land that my townspeople take for granted is going to be lost to development. It would make all the difference in the world to know that funds would be available if I planned it right and generated sufficient State and local financial commitment. And it seems to me it would be even better if those funds also encouraged some new and creative thinking about partnerships with nonprofit organizations or private interests directed at the use of that land.

The land and water conservation fund and the historic preservation fund can help State and local governments do this. LWCF is the only source of Federal money available to them for the acquisition of open space and the development of marinas, playing fields, bike paths, pools, and the like. HPF is the only source of grant money to the States for historic preservation.

LWCF's record of success is extraordinary. Since its inception in 1964 nearly $7 billion has been invested in every district across the country. The computer printout of projects financed by just the State side of LWCF runs to 466 pages. And it's a model of efficiency because States and localities define their own priorities without heavyhanded Federal rules. They have to demonstrate their commitment to the projects they want with their own resources to match the Federal grant.

We do not need to radically remake this remarkable program. But we must reform it to meet today's challenge and establish the permanent legacy we owe future generations. Currently $900 million, mostly from offshore oil and gas revenues, flows into the fund each year. But what is spent is entirely left to the discretion of the appropriations process. Unfortunately, LWCF spending trends are alarming. Since 1981, appropriations have dropped to an average of only $200 million annually, just 22 percent of the available money and less than a third of the average of $681 million spent in the previous 3 years.

Consequently, there is now an unappropriated balance in the fund of more than $6 billion.

My bill would not add a dime to the money now coming into the fund. But it would make other significant changes. First, the unappropriated balance will be placed in a new account invested in Government securities and generating interest each year. The same offshore oil and gas revenues will flow into the fund, building the principal and therefore the interest. The new law would stipulate that once these revenues enter the fund, they could never leave it or be spent for any purpose.

Instead, the interest from the fund would be automatically appropriated—with necessary congressional oversight and control—each year. This automatically appropriated interest would provide a gradually rising floor under annual LWCF disbursements.

This would continue until the amount of interest generated each year by the funds reached at least $1 billion. Then, the $900 million feeding the fund each year would terminate—and there would never be any need to allocate new Government revenues to it. The climb to annual outlays of $1 billion would be a modest, gradual one. Depending on interest rates and other variables, I estimate it would take about 10 years to reach this ceiling. Thus, the impact on the budget would be similarly modest and gradual, especially in the all-important early years.

I also want to underscore the conclusion of the Congressional Budget Office that this legislation, of itself, does not affect the deficient.

Although my overriding interest is to see a larger and more stable flow of money from the fund, I am highly sensitive to the need for congressional oversight of this spending through the appropriations process.

Therefore, the bill explicitly provides for an active and important role for the Appropriations Committees. First, it would be entirely up to the Congress to determine which lands would be acquired for national parks, wildlife refuges, and forest, when and for how much, just as it does now.

Second, the amounts appropriated each year from the fund would be made available according to a formula that provides the Congress flexibility in determining where the greatest needs are in a given year. For example, the formula states that at least 30 percent of the annual allocation must go to Federal projects, at least 30 percent to the States, at least 10 percent to the Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Program and for 10 years, at least 10 percent to provide matching grants to States establishing trusts that parallel the new Federal trust. The remainder could be made available to any or all of these purposes.

And finally, should the Congress determine that for overriding reasons the full amount of interest should not be spent in any given year, it will have the ability to spend less by placing an obligation limitation on that year's automatic appropriation. Any difference between the two amounts would remain with the fund, adding to its principal. All these decisions are to be in annual appropriations bills, as the legislation stipulates.

In general, the bill provides that the Historic Preservation Fund would be operated in a parallel fashion.

There are a number of other features to this bill that I will only mention in passing at this point. We try to stimulate new and creative uses of LWCF moneys by encouraging partnerships with nonprivate corporations and private entities. We require the States to pass through at least half of their annual allocation to local governments. For 3 years, localities are eligible for matching grants from the fund to do open space planning. We have new requirements on Federal agencies to plan for and prioritize their acquisitions.

Amendments adopted last year by the Interior Committee are incorporated in the new bill. Among them is a provision sponsored by Mr. KOSTMAYER of Pennsylvania to give States more latitude in using LWCF moneys to purchase conservation easements on farm land. Also included is an amendment requiring that one-third of the annual Federal allocation be spent on previously authorized acquisitions.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a partisan program or a regional program. For nearly a century the voices speaking to us about the love of the land and the stewardship of our natural resources have been Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives, southerners and easterners and westerners. They have always been peculiarly American.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCEWEN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

[Mr. MCEWEN addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

A BREAKDOWN OF ONE CONGRESSMAN'S SALARY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, I took this time at the end of the day's business and, unlike others who with nauseating regularity use special orders to try to pretend that they are engaged in debates with people, I will readily admit that at this point there is virtually no one on the floor. There is nothing wrong with that because everyone knows the business of the House is over after the business has been conducted. Special orders are simply soundoff time for individual Members.

Mr. Speaker, I take this time today because I have tremendous respect for the tradition of public service. I have tremendous respect for the constituents who sent me here. I have tremendous respect for the history of this House.

I do not share a similar level of respect for a good many Members who populate this House. I regret that. But I am going to be honest.

I think there has been incredible demagoguery on the part of some, not all, members of the press—in fact, I saw some very good straight reporting on this issue by some newspapers and even two networks, on one occasion each.

But I have seen a lot of misstatements. I want to discuss this pay raise issue in its generic terms today and to do that I want to put it in some perspective, including historical perspective.

First of all, I should start by simply asking, and I hope that tonight, the three television networks and McNeill/Lehrer will be a little bit more accurate than they were yesterday when they described the vote that occurred yesterday as being a vote to adjourn the House until Thursday.

It was not; it was a vote to adjourn the House to today.

Just for the hell of it I would like to see the networks get that correct, if it is not too much bother.

Second, I have seen a number of statements that appear in some of the less thoughtful of the press publications indicating that Members get free medical care and free dental care.

I even saw one religious newspaper carry a column which indicated that we got free life insurance and I saw one newspaper editorial saying "wouldn't you like it if you were like a Congressman and you didn't have any deductions from your check?"

Well, I simply want to set the record straight.

I have here the withholding statement for my last year's salary. What it shows is that $22,566.72 was withheld for Federal income taxes. It shows $7,128 was withheld for State income taxes. Wisconsin is a high tax State. It is also a high service State and I am proud of it.

The argument is often made that Members of Congress get a free retirement program. If that is the case I would like to know why last year $7,812 was deducted from my salary for my own retirement.

If I receive free life insurance I would like to know why $1,400 was deducted from my salary last year for term—not whole life—life insurance.

And I would like to know, if we get free health care, why I contributed $624 in payment of the 40-percent employee share which is the common practice for many corporations and the Federal Government.

□ 1350

I would also like to know, since I got out of the hospital about a week or 10 days ago, why, if Members of Congress get free health care, why I was presented with a $1,500 bill for a 3-day stay at Bethesda. My wife would also like to know.

To have absolute total disclosure, let me make one additional comment before I discuss this issue generically. We often hear the argument that Members of Congress should not go into public service to get rich. That is absolutely correct. I am proud to say that I have lived up to that expectation. I have a home in my hometown, I have a home here in Washington, and I have a half-interest in a tiny cottage which my wife and I own jointly with another party which is worth—our interest in that cottage—is worth about $10,000. With the exception of the home in my district and the small cottage in my district and the home that I have here, I have no other investments. I have no stocks, because I think they are a conflict of interest. I do not want to have to vote on health care issues, holding tobacco stock. I do not want to have to vote on utility issues, holding utility stock. So I have no stocks. For two reasons, honestly. One is because I think it is a conflict of interest, and second, because I do not have the money to buy them. The only asset which I have is somewhere between $9,000 and $11,000 in my savings account which I have accumulated over the 20 years that I have spent here. I do not say that to apologize in any way. I say that simply to state the facts. I suspect there are many other Members around here who are in roughly the same shape.

That is certainly not bad shape. I know a whole lot of people in my district who would be very happy to be in that shape, but I would also suggest that it doesn't indicate that this Member has gotten rich on this job and he never will and never wants to.

When I first went into public service I served in the Wisconsin Legislature. We were paid $3,600 a year whether we needed it or not. My wife worked as a speech therapist, and she made more money than I did. I was uncomfortable about that, but I was also grateful she did. I mention that simply to make a point that I have been happy in public service at whatever the salary level has been. I really do not care what the pay is, so long as there is enough money to pay the bills and to send my kids to school. What I do care deeply about is the political process, the honesty of the political process, and the honesty with which each of us in this House deal with each other, deal with the press, and deal with our constituencies. To understand some of the shell games which have occurred on this issue, I think it is necessary to recite a little history.

Before 1976 there were no outside income limitations whatsoever on Members of Congress or Members of the U.S. Senate. In 1976, I was appointed by Speaker O'Neill to chair a bipartisan task force which was composed of Republicans and Democrats and outside public members to try to write a new Code of Ethics for the House of Representatives. We came up with a series or recommendations. One of those recommendations was to, for the first time, limit the amount of outside income that Members of Congress could earn in addition to their congressional salary. We had a choice at that time. The choice was whether to rely simply on disclosure or to rely on disclosure plus some outside limits. We had a lot of good people on both sides of this issue.

Before we moved, I commissioned a national poll by Lou Harris. We spent $50,000 of the taxpayers' money to do something that public bodies do not very often do officially. We wanted to find out exactly what taxpayers thought what we ought to do about some of the ethical questions facing the Congress. And we found among other things that the public wanted Members of Congress to spend more time being in connection with their districts. We found that members of the public wanted Members of Congress to focus more on their jobs and less on their outside income, and we found a lot of concern about conflicts of interest on the part of Members who had huge stock holdings or huge investments in one kind of business or another, and still voted on those issues. We had no authority to deal with inherited income or previously accumulated income because we cannot, under the Constitution, take away or limit in any way income or wealth that people have already earned. It is on unconstitutional taking of property. But we did try to decide what was the proper relationship between outside earned income and salary income.

At that time several members of the press testified against the idea of limiting outside income in any way. They had what they thought were very good reasons. They felt that human beings could not write laws tight enough and yet at the same time flexible enough to take into consideration every variable in human behavior and every economic condition of 535 people in the Congress. So they advised us: "do not limit outside income in any way. Just rely on disclosure." That was a perfectly honorable position. I happened to have disagreed with it and so did our Commission at the time. And so what we proposed was a tradeoff. We worked with President Ford leaving Office, President Carter coming into Office—I remember Member Dick Bolling worked directly with Jimmy Carter on that issue—and we put together a tradeoff. We said: "We will provide an increase in direct congressional reimbursement to Members of the House, and in turn for that, we will impose a limitation on Members' outside income."

We had a whale of a fight here, and if it had not been for the intervention of Speaker O'Neill, we would have lost that fight because many of the high-income Members of the House fought those reforms tooth and nail. One Member was making over $125,000 a year in law practice. Understandably, he did not want to give that up. Another Member was making over $100,000 a year in insurance, and he did not want to give that up. One Member, a lawyer, came to me and said, "OBEY, you do not understand. For people who are lawyers, it is not that our law practice takes any time away from our job, it is just as we rise in seniority, the lobby groups might decide to toss more business our way and we'd get a cut of the action."

□ 1400

I looked at him and I said, "I know." And you could see the lights go on in his head, because he realized we really did not have a clerical error in the development of the legislation, we really did mean to cut that kind of stuff out. So we had a tough fight, and we passed it.

I find it ironic that some sectors of the press who at the time objected to our reform package as being too tough and too "Common Cause-ish" now today are criticizing those very same rules for not being tough enough.

I do remember that on the day our reform package came to the House floor, one senior reporter from the Washington Post wrote an op-ed piece attacking our reform package, urging that the House vote it down because we should not provide limitations on outside income, that we were not smart enough to write the rules. And he specifically objected to the fact that we did not have an exemption in our rules for book royalties. We did. He was looking at the wrong draft of the proposal.

But I find it ironic that some of the same members of the press who were attacking us and suggesting that we did not have an exemption for book royalties in 1976 are now attacking us today because we did. I do not mind the change in opinion; there is nothing wrong with that. I do mind the sanctimony that accompanies the change in opinion.

Now, cutting short history today, as a result of those limitations the Senate is limited to 40 percent of their salaried income which they can take in the form of outside earned income. The House is entitled to 30 percent, in addition to Members' salaried income. Some of the income comes from speaking fees.

I have looked at a good many disclosure forms from Members of Congress. I venture to say that because of my experience as chairman of the reform commission, I probably know more about the individual financial situations of individual Members of Congress than any other Members of this House. And as I say, some of that income comes from speaking fees. I have looked at disclosure statements, and I think that 90 percent of the Members of this House have been reasonably careful in seeing to it that those speaking fees come from correct sources or come under correct conditions. But as we know, there have been some occasions on which a small number of Members of this House have greatly embarrassed the institution because of the manner in which they have dealt with that privilege.

I also think that the continued situation by which many Members can serve on corporate boards or continue to practice law is troubling, not necessarily because of the individual conduct of Members—because I think most Members who do that do it in a perfectly honorable fashion—but I do think it causes concern about the House which is not healthy.

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OBEY. I would appreciate it, Mr. Speaker, if I could first complete my statement, and then I will be happy to yield.

So the question is, how do we deal with this in a way which is civil, in a way which is fair to our employers, the taxpayers, and in ways which will be clearly and fairly understood by them and clearly and fairly reported by the media? I really do not know the answer to that question. I do know that there has been a substantial amount of the story which has gone unreported.

Let me tell the Members what the numbers show that I have looked back on.

I know that many of the people in this country are under the impression that the Presidential Commission that was created to deal with congressional pay is a new creation. It is not. It was created in 1968, before I ever got to this place. I came here on April Fool's Day in 1969 many people think that was appropriate. But since 1969, in 12 of the years since then, the Congress decided to exclude itself from any pay raise which was provided either to Social Security recipients or to other Federal employees. So in 1970, 1971, 1972, 1973, 1974, 1976, 1978, 1980, 1981, 1983, 1986, and 1988, Congress provided no pay raise for itself. In 4 of the years in the 20 years that I have been here, Congress provided what were called cost-of-living increases of 5 percent, 5.4 percent, 4 percent, and 3.5 percent. In addition, in the last 10 years, there have been two partial "catch-ups" as some people call them—I put that in quotes—two partial "catch-ups" of 18 percent and 15 percent.

The result of that has been that in the last 20 years congressional salaries have been increased on an average by 4.2 percent a year. Other Federal employees have had their salaries increased by 4.8 percent a year, the CPI has gone up by 6.4 percent a year, white collar workers have experienced on an average a 7-percent increase in pay, and blue collar workers have experienced a 6.7-percent increase in pay. I applaud those increases in pay for workers and for Social Security recipients. I voted for every one of those that I could possibly get my hands on because I thought people needed them.

I state these numbers again not in any way to complain but simply so that somewhere there is in the public record a description of what has actually taken place over the 20-year period. I do so to put in context my view that those who believe that the public benefits when the Congress votes on its own pay are simply wrong.

Let me tell you why I say that. I have received literally hundreds of letters from my district from people who say, "OBEY, I can't vote on my own pay. Why should you?" I agree with that. I do not think we ought to vote on our own pay.

Second, rule VIII of this House, which has been unchanged since 1890, says that Members of the House should vote on every question put in this House unless the Member has a personal or financial conflict of interest in the outcome of the vote. Certainly there is no vote that represents a greater conflict of interest than one to set your own pay. I know of no one in this society outside of Members of Congress who gets to set their own pay, and I do not believe Members of Congress should either. That is why I think it is ethically absurd to suggest that Members of Congress somehow improve public ethics when they vote on their own pay.

Mr. Speaker, I also think that when Congress does vote on its own pay it reaches new heights of hypocrisy and duplicity. So do many people who report it, and so do many people who talk about it.

Let me give my colleagues a couple examples of the hypocrisy which I have personally witnessed on this floor. I remember 4 or 5 years ago, when we had one of those cost-of-living increases that was voted on. I think it was for 4 percent at the time. I have forgotten exactly. One Member of this House was on all three television networks leading the charge against that raise publicly. But privately, the day that it finally passed, he was standing right underneath George Washington's portrait, standing right next to me, leaning against the rail, and he literally jumped up and down with glee saying, "Hooray, we got it, we got it!"

Mr. Speaker, does anybody really believe that the public's right to know is enhanced by that kind of baloney?

Later, when a group of Members of this House went to court, filed a suit in Federal court, to try to stop the pay raise, I remember one of those Members who had proudly put his name on that court suit and bragged about it in the media. I remember him sitting on this floor laughing and saying to me, "You know the court is going to throw that suit out, and I know the court is going to throw that suit out, but my district doesn't, and I'm having one heck of a ride."

Mr. Speaker, I think there is some other hypocrisy going on as well. I saw Mark Shields, who is one of the few people in the media who I think has cut through the hypocrisy on this nonsense. I saw him say the other day that he was watching "millionaires row" in the Senate as they performed on this issue. I do not know if the public is aware of it or not, but somewhere between 60 and 70 percent of the other body—in plain language that is the Senate—somewhere between 60 and 70 of the 100 Members in that House are estimated to be millionaires. Nothing wrong with that. Nothing wrong with that. They probably earned it, and it is theirs to spend any way they want.

However there is another factor in dealing with the Senate vote that the public ought to be aware of. I have discussed this issue with a number of Senators who made it exquisitely clear to me that under no circumstances would they ever vote to reduce or eliminate outside earned income. What they say to me is this. They say, "OBEY, anybody who considers a pay raise is nuts because, if you get one, the public will be so upset about it that you won't get one for another 10 years, and so it's a whole lot easier for us to simply raise the limit on our outside income through the years because that isn't focused on. It's much quieter, much less hassle."

Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that, if the public believes that that is in the public interest of this country, they need to reexamine the question once again.

I simply want to say that I have absolutely no idea what a Member of Congress ought to be paid. There is no one in America less qualified to make that determination. There are, frankly, people in this body who I regard as being grossly overpaid. And there are many Members of this body who I think the taxpayers are very lucky to have at the salary they are earning, on both sides of the political aisle.

I do believe that one way for the Congress to deal with this problem—because, as I have said, I do not believe that we are improved ethically or substantively when we continually vote on our own pay in a conflict-of-interest situation—so I do believe that we ought to look at the possibility of arranging it in such a manner that congressional pay is adjusted annually and automatically by the same amount by which other Federal employees' pay is adjusted. Or another measuring stick might perhaps be to have congressional salaries adjusted by the same percentage that private-sector workers in this society had their pay adjusted in that or the previous year. I think that ought to happen automatically without Members' involvement because of the hypocrisy which is involved when we have Members voting on their own pay.

In terms of what the proper base ought to be from which those cost-of-living increases from time to time are made, I do not know how to determine that, but I do believe fundamentally that, even if it takes a constitutional amendment, we should get Congress out of the business.

I would be very interested, for instance, in seeing what the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and any other group of citizens that anybody wants to name would feel would be the proper process and the proper amount to set in determining the correct base for congressional salaries. All I know is that we have a vested interest in it here, and we should not be voting on it. But, if we are required to, if we are required to vote on it, then we ought to take a look at it as a package. We ought to take a look not only at what the proper level of this salary ought to be, but we also ought to at that time take a look at what tradeoffs ought to be required for any adjustment. By way of outside income adjustment, by way of some other practices that are engaged in around here. I do not think anything constructive will happen. I think that this place will continue to clunk along the way it has the last 10 years dealing with this issue on an ad-hoc basis, each time confusing the public with demagoguery and rhetoric. But I hope that I am wrong.

I hope that the leadership of both Houses, and I hope that the intellectual leadership of the country for that matter, will spend a little time and expend a little effort in trying to help figure out exactly how this problem ought to be handled. Because, while the taxpayers' interest in the narrowest of terms only, is temporarily served by what happened today—and I certainly voted against the product today—I think that the taxpayers' interest will not be served in the long term if we do not make the kind of adjustments which were made in 1976 so that we can finish the reform that was begun in 1976 and still make it possible for someone other than millionaires to serve in this body, most especially the Senate of the United States which has increasingly become, to the detriment of working people all over this country, a rich man's club.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, first I would like to thank the gentleman for having the courage to take out this special order and continue the discussion of the subject that apparently most of our colleagues would like very much to put behind us today and for the next few weeks and months perhaps.

Mr. OBEY. Well, I would like to put it behind me, too, but I do think the public is owed a full explanation of what the issues are.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I think we owe the gentleman a great debt for attempting to do that.

There is a whole lot of heat that has been focused on this subject, but very little light. The gentleman seems to be in a position to have a great deal of light to throw on the issue. I really appreciate the gentleman taking out this special order to do that.

I want the gentleman to know that many of the things he just said were news to me. I learned a great deal in the few minutes that I sat here.

At one point the gentleman said that in the interest of saving time he was skipping a little bit in this chronology of what has happened over the years. I hope the gentleman will have that chronology in writing of what has happened over the years as Congress has refused to accept pay increases on the basis of cost-of-living increases, and the whole chronology would be very useful to me and a number of other people, I am sure.

To the American people in general, this is not a point at which we ought to cut off dialog. I think we really ought to call upon the public to take a close look at how our budgets are made, how our decisions are made, and just exactly what is a Congressman. We cannot fully define it, but we can certainly take some steps to make people better understand what this is all about.

So I hope the gentleman will have in writing the chronology somewhere, if he does not have it today, and let us have it.

I would also like to say that there comes a point where we ought to be leaders and take the initiative in educating the American people about what the 20th century is all about in terms of the budget and in terms of cost. We have a trillion dollar budget which most people cannot comprehend at all. We do not discuss budget matters very much in this country. In England, the BBC takes 2 days whenever the national budget is promulgated, they set aside 2 days to do nothing but discuss the national budget.

We have just had a situation where a pay raise, which seemed to be on the minds of large numbers of people, a lot of hysteria was generated by it, and we only discussed it for 40 minutes, 20 minutes for the opposition to the resolution and 20 minutes for those in favor of the resolution, which is a bit ridiculous. We ought to be willing to discuss what 20th century costs are all about.

We ought to be willing to say to the American people that when you are spending $150 billion for overseas bases, you ought to take a close look at what you are paying the people who make the decisions about keeping that $150 billion expenditure for overseas bases going.

When we are spending on MX missiles $75 million, $75 million to build the MX missile and another $75 million to house the MX missile, we ought to look at what these modern costs are all about.

We ought to take a hard look at our current situation that is in front of us.

At this point I would like to read into the RECORD my statement on the congressional pay raise, because I think the two issues overlap. I am concerned about the savings and loan scandal and how we have had our attention diverted from concern about the savings and loan scandal, which is a $90 billion scandal, a $90 billion expenditure, most of which will come out of the hides of the American taxpayers.

While we look at the pay raise, it is an insignificant portion of the total trillion dollar budget for 1990, but right away the savings and loan scandal will mean a great amount of money impacted on the coming 1990 fiscal year, which will mean that we cannot spend money for other very important activities. Education, which so greatly needs more investment, will not be able to receive the kind of investment it needs at this point from the man who has called himself the education President, because of the impact that the savings and loan association scandal is going to have.

I am voting in favor of raising the pay of Congressmen because I think 535 vice presidents of the largest corporation in the world, who make life and death decisions affecting people all over the world, deserve to be paid at the level recommended by the Commission.

As the gentleman has pointed out, I do not know exactly what a Congressman is worth. I do not try to pretend to make some assessment myself. I would be in this body and I would be thankful to be in this body if the pay were cut in half tomorrow. The money is not the motivation for most of us being here, but we would like to see some sense of respect in terms of dollar value to be paid for the kind of activities we engage in.

Even with this 51-percent increase, congressional pay will remain below the level of $143,000, which would be the amount of pay Congressmen would receive if congressional pay had kept pace with inflation.

As the Congressman has pointed out, time after time Congress has refused to accept the cost-of-living increase, and as a result of that we have fallen steadily behind so that we are not at the level of $143,000, which would be where a Congressman would be automatically without having a sudden 51-percent increase if those pay raises had been accepted. For political reasons, for pandering to hysteria, we have not done that.

Despite the stampede atmosphere created by the media the public should be reminded that this pay raise is the recommendation of an objective commission and was approved by the most popular President in recent history, as well as by the incoming President.

It is unfortunate that a mob hysteria has been generated over a matter which will have no significant impact on the overall budget for fiscal year 1990. Meanwhile, this diversionary headline-grabber has taken the attention of the American people away from the real budget-busting monster on the agenda of the Congress. The savings and loan association scandal represents a $90 billion swindle which will paralyze the national budget for the next 4 years.

There will be no money to invest in educational reform, job training, or better health care. This savings and loan association ripoff constitutes the greatest and most brazen scandal in the history of the Nation.

We are being plunged into socialism for the banking industry in order to compensate for the misdeeds of incompetents and criminals.

According to President Bush's proposal, we are going to have banks being managed by the Government, banks being managed by regulators. If that is not socialism, I do not know what it is. Why have socialism at the level of the banking industry? Why are we subsidizing to the tune of $90 billion the banking industry, or a segment of the banking industry?

The failing savings and loan institutions are a network of racketeering enterprises which operated for a long time in collusion with certified public accountants and Government regulators.

I am pleased that I voted "yes" on a much-needed pay raise in order to get the matter off the agenda and allow the American people to focus on this $90 billion swindle, which is of far greater importance to their lives and the lives of their grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to conclude by saying that I expect to take out time to talk just about the impact of this possible $90 billion swindle on the coming 1990 fiscal year and what that means.

□ 1440

I think it is important to link that with the pay raise and say that the people who are making decisions every day about $90 billion affairs in connection with savings and loan associations or $150 billion in connection with our funding of overseas bases or $75 million per MX missile, on and on it goes; we are making life-and-death decisions every day. We are spending billions of dollars of the taxpayers', and we deserve to have some respect. We deserve to be treated as professionals. We deserve to be required full-time workers, paid on a scale comparable to other people who have the same experience, education and make the same kinds of decisions.

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman did mention heat. In this regard, I would also like to talk just a moment about the way in which I think our Speaker has been manhandled for the past 3 to 4 weeks.

Mr. Speaker, we have seen story after story about Members of the House issuing press statements attacking the Speaker because he was "using his power to prevent a vote on this issue." Those statements would be perfectly all right with me if a number of those same Members had not gone to the Speaker privately and sought assurances that there would not be a vote.

Mr. Speaker, I know of one Member of my delegation on the minority side of the aisle who roundly criticized the Speaker's actions and yet who, on the trolley going between the Rayburn Building and the Capitol about 3 weeks ago, expressed to me deep concern lest the Speaker allow this to come to a vote.

Let me simply say that I think the Speaker's instinct that the 50-percent pay raise was too much was correct, and I applaud him for having the common sense to recognize that. The portion of the pay raise which the Speaker sought to preserve was that portion associated with reform. I do not know if that was the right combination. It was certainly better than the 50 percent.

I do not think that Members of Congress or other high-income people in this society necessarily have to always fully keep up with the cost of living—I do think that is necessary for people at the low end of the totem pole—but neither do I believe that virtue is served if Members of Congress never have an adjustment in their pay. That is why I would prefer to see an annual regular adjustment based on some other measurable index such as what has happened to other workers in society. Because when we do not do that, as has been indicated, then when Congress tries to play these catchup games, it winds up doing it in a manner which brings disgust down upon the entire institution and many of its Members.

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to apologize to the Speaker for the hypocrisy of many Members of this House who had a field day on this issue by pummeling him personally while they were asking him privately to allow the law to stand.

I would also like to congratulate several members of the press. I would like to congratulate the members, the four members, of the Magazine and Periodical Gallery, the board members of that gallery, who were defeated in their most recent election because they had reminded members of that gallery that there was a rule which required disclosure of the outside income of members of the press who used that gallery.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is perfectly appropriate to have disclosure of outside income for anyone in public life, and I regard very visible members of the press as also being in public life. I think that if anyone believes that network news anchors or well-known political commentators—be they on the networks or public broadcasting, or you name it—if anyone really believes that it is healthy for them to collect $5,000-$10,000 a speech in speaking fees and not report the source of that income, then I think they are dead wrong.

A long time ago, we got over the hurdle that resisted disclosure of Members' outside income, and I think, with all due respect, that the press owes the country a similar obligation. I would certainly suggest that network news anchors and many of the visible network reporters and commentators have far more ability to influence public opinion than 1 of 535 Members of this Congress.

I remember when we were voting on those reforms in 1976, and when I gave a speech to the Western Wisconsin Press Association discussing my concerns about disclosure for politicians and the press. I remember at that time having my attention brought by Senator Gaylord Nelson from Wisconsin to the fact that one science reporter for one of the major news magazines in this country who was writing and routinely covering Nelson's hearings on drugs and on drug company profits, that one of those reporters himself had about $30,000 or $40,000 in drug company stock at the time.

I think the consuming public and the taxpayers have a right to know what those sources of income are, too, So I would suggest that both politicians and members of the press ought to take a look at their own houses as well as the others and come up with a set of rules which can make both of us look a whole lot better than we are looking right now.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. TAUZIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise only to report that a strange confluence of events prevented me from being here when the rollcall was taken on rollcall No. 6, I understand.

Actually, it was a confluence of events that involved ice in Houston, the Madri Gras in New Orleans, and some FAA rules that required the flight crew of Continental to get enough sleep before they got back into the air, 2 hours' delay in flight No. 1252. Unfortunately, I was not here when the rollcall was taken.

I want to first of all thank those folks at Continental for doing their best, despite the FAA rules, to get me here on time, and to acknowledge their assistance in that effort, but we failed to get here on time, unfortunately.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD reflect that had I been here to vote on House Joint Resolution 129 when rollcall No. 6 was taken, that I would have recorded a vote "yes" in favor of the resolution of disapproval and therefore would have voted against the pay raise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DARDEN). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR THE 101ST CONGRESS

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to House rule XI, clause 2(a), I am pleased to submit the rules of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for the 101st Congress for printing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The rules were adopted at the committee's organizational meeting on January 26, 1989, by unanimous voice vote.

RULES OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS

RULE I—GENERAL PROVISIONS

The Rules of the House are the rules of the committee and subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day is a motion of high privilege in committees and subcommittees. Each subcommittee of the committee is a part of the committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of the committee and to its rules so far as applicable.

RULE II—MEETINGS

(a) The regular meeting day for the full committee shall be at 10 a.m. on the second Tuesday of each month, and at such other times and in such places as the chairman may designate; however, a regular Tuesday meeting of the committee may be dispensed with by the chairman.

(b) The chairman may call and convene, as he considers necessary, additional meetings of the committee for the consideration of any bill or resolution pending before the committee or for the conduct of other committee business. The committee shall meet for such purpose pursuant to the call of the chairman.

(c)(1) Each meeting for the transaction of business, including the markup of legislation, of the committee or each subcommittee thereto shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a quorum present, determines by rollcall vote that all or part of the remainder of the meeting on that day shall be closed to the public: Provided, however, That no person other than members of the committee and such congressional staff and such departmental representatives as they may authorize shall be present at any business or markup session which has been closed to the public. This paragraph does not apply to subparagraph (2) of this paragraph, or to any meeting that relates solely to internal budget or personnel matters.

(2) Each hearing conducted by the committee or each subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public except when the committee or subcommittee, in open session and with a quorum present, determines by roll call vote that all or part of the remainder of that hearing on that day shall be closed to the public because disclosure of testimony, evidence, or other matters to be considered would endanger the national security or would violate any law or rule of the House of Representatives: Provided, however, That the committee or subcommittee may by the same procedure vote to close one subsequent day of hearing.

RULE III—RECORDS AND ROLLCALLS

(a) There shall be kept in writing a record of the proceedings of the committee and of each subcommittee, including a record of the votes on any question on which a roll call is demanded. The result of each such roll call vote shall be made available by the committee for inspection by the public at reasonable times in the offices of the committee. Information so available for public inspection shall include a description of the amendment, motion, order or other proposition and the name of each member voting for and each member voting against such amendment, motion, order, or proposition, and the names of those members present but not voting. A record vote may be demanded by one-fifth of the members present or, in the apparent absence of a quorum, by any one member. With respect to each record vote by the committee to report any bill or resolution, the total number of votes cast for and the total number of votes cast against the reporting of such bill or such resolution shall be included in the committee report.

(b) The records of the committee at the National Archives and Records Administration shall be made available for public use in accordance with rule XXXVI of the Rules of the House of Representatives. The chairman shall notify the ranking minority member of any decision, pursuant to clause 3(b)(3) or clause 4(b) of the rule, to withold a record otherwise available, and the matter shall be presented to the committee for a determination on the written request of any member of the committee.

RULE IV—QUORUMS

A majority of the members of the committee shall constitute a quorum of the committee for business and a majority of the members of any subcommittee shall constitute a quorum thereof for business: Provid- ed, That any two members shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of taking testimony and receiving evidence.

RULE V—HEARING PROCEDURES

(a) The chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by the committee, and the appropriate subcommittee chairman, in the case of hearings to be conducted by a subcommittee, shall make public announcement of the date, place, and subject matter of any hearing to be conducted on any measure or matter at least one week before the commencement of that hearing unless the committee determines that there is good cause to begin such hearing at an earlier date. In the latter event, the chairman or the subcommittee chairman, whichever the case may be, shall make such public announcement at the earliest possible date. The clerk of the committee shall promptly notify the Daily Clerk of the Congressional Record as soon as possible after such public announcement is made.

(b) So far as practicable, each witness who is to appear before the committee or a subcommittee shall file with the clerk of the committee, at least 48 hours in advance of his or her appearance, a written statement of his or her proposed testimony and shall limit his or her oral presentation to a summary of the statement.

(c) When any hearing is conducted by the committee or any subcommittee upon any measure or matter, the minority party members on the committee shall be entitled, upon request to the chairman of a majority of those minority members before the completion of such hearing, to call such witnesses selected by the minority to testify with respect to that measure or matter during at least one day of hearing thereon.

(d) All other members of the committee may have the privilege of sitting with any subcommittee during its hearing or deliberations and may participate in such hearings or deliberations but no such member who is not a member of the subcommittee shall vote on any matter before such subcommittee.

(e) Committee members may question witnesses only when they have been recognized by the chairman for that purpose, and only for a 5-minute period until all members present have had an opportunity to question a witness. The 5-minute period for questioning a witness by any one member can be extended only with the unanimous consent of all members present. The questioning of witnesses in both full and subcommittee hearings shall be initiated by the chairman, followed by the ranking minority party member and all other members alternating between the majority and minority. In recognizing members to question witnesses in this fashion, the chairman shall take into consideration the ratio of the majority to minority members present and shall establish the order of recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the members of the majority.

RULE VI—OVERSIGHT

(a) In order to assist the House in:

(1) Its analysis, appraisal, evaluation of (A) the application, administration, execution, and effectiveness of the laws enacted by the Congress, or (B) conditions and circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation, and

(2) its formulation, consideration and enactment of such modifications or changes in those laws, and of such additional legislation, as may be necessary or appropriate, the various subcommittees, consistent with their jurisdiction as set forth in Rule VIII, shall have oversight responsibilities as provided in paragraph (b).

(b) Each subcommittee shall review and study, on a continuing basis, the applications, administration, execution, and effectiveness of those laws, or parts of laws, the subject matter of which is within the jurisdiction of that subcommittee, and the organization and operation of the Federal agencies and entities having responsibilities in or for the administration and execution thereof, in order to determine whether such laws and the programs thereunder are being implemented and carried out in accordance with the intent of the Congress and whether such programs should be continued, curtailed, or eliminated.

In addition, each such subcommittee shall review and study any conditions or circumstances which may indicate the necessity or desirability of enacting new or additional legislation within the jurisdiction of that subcommittee (whether or not any bill or resolution has been introduced with respect thereto), and shall on a continuing basis undertake future research and forecasting on matters within the jurisdiction of that subcommittee.

(c) Each subcommittee shall review and study on a continuing basis the impact or probable impact of tax policies affecting subjects within its jurisdictions.

RULE VII—BROADCASTING OF COMMITTEE HEARINGS

Broadcasting, either by radio or TV of all open committee hearings and meetings shall be permitted when, in the judgment of the chairman, in consultation with the ranking minority member, such action is warranted. Photographs shall be permitted during hearings of the full committee and subcommittees as the chairman decides.

All coverage shall be subject to the following provisions:

(1) If the television or radio coverage of the hearing or meeting is to be presented to the public as live coverage, that coverage shall be conducted and presented without commercial sponsorship.

(2) No witness served with a subpoena by the committee shall be required against his or her will to be photographed at any hearing or to give evidence or testimony while the broadcasting of that hearing, by radio or television, is being conducted. At the request of any such witness who does not wish to be subjected to radio, television or still photography coverage, all lenses shall be covered and all microphones used for coverage turned off.

(3) Not more than four television cameras, operating from fixed positions, shall be permitted in a hearing or meeting room. The allocation among the television media of the positions of the number of television cameras permitted in a hearing or meeting room shall be in accordance with fair and equitable procedures devised by the Executive Committee of the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(4) Television cameras shall be placed so as not to obstruct in any way the space between any witness giving evidence or testimony and any member of the committee or the visibility of that witness and that member to each other.

(5) Television cameras shall not be placed in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing or meeting by other media.

(6) Equipment necessary for coverage by the television and radio media shall not be installed in, or removed from, the hearing or meeting room while the committee is in session.

(7) Floodlights, spotlights, strobelights, and flashguns shall not be used in providing any method of coverage of the hearing or meeting, except that the television media may install additional lighting in the hearing or meeting room, without cost to the Government, in order to raise the ambient lighting level in the hearing or meeting room to the lowest level necessary to provide adequate television coverage of the hearing or meeting at the then current state of the art of television coverage.

(8) Not more than five press photographers shall be permitted to cover a hearing or meeting by still photography. In the selection of these photographers, preference shall be given to photographers from Associated Press Photos and United Press International Newspictures. If request is made by more than five of the media for coverage of the hearing or meeting by still photography, that coverage shall be made on the basis of a fair and equitable pool arrangement devised by the Standing Committee of Press Photographers.

(9) Photographers shall not place themselves in positions which obstruct the view between members of the committee and the witness table.

(10) Photographers shall not place themselves in positions which obstruct unnecessarily the coverage of the hearing by the other media.

(11) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media shall be then currently accredited to the Radio and Television Correspondents' Galleries.

(12) Personnel providing coverage by still photograph shall be then currently accredited to the Press Photographers' Gallery.

(13) Personnel providing coverage by the television and radio media and by still photography shall conduct themselves and their coverage activities in an orderly and unobtrusive manner.

RULE VIII—NUMBER AND JURISDICTION OF SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) There shall be five standing subcommittees as follows: Oversight and Investigations; Hospitals and Health Care; Education, Training and Employment; Compensation, Pension and Insurance; and Housing and Memorial Affairs. All proposed legislation and other matters related to the subcommittees listed under standing subcommittees named below shall be referred to such subcommittees, respectively.

Oversight and Investigations: Investigative authority over matters that are referred to the subcommittee by the chairman of the full committee for investigation and appropriate recommendations.

Hospitals and Health Care: Veterans' hospitals, medical care, and treatment of veterans.

Education, Training and Employment: Education of veterans, vocational rehabilitation, and readjustment of servicemen to civilian life.

Compensation, Pension and Insurance: Compensation, pensions of all the wars of the United States, general and special, and life insurance issued by the Government on account of service in the Armed Forces.

Housing and Memorial Affairs: Veterans' housing programs, and cemeteries of the United States in which veterans of any war or conflict are or may be buried, whether in the United States or abroad, except cemeteries administered by the Secretary of the Interior, and burial benefits.

(b) The chairman and the ranking minority member shall serve as ex-officio members of all subcommittees and shall have the right to vote on all matters before the subcommittee.

RULE IX—POWERS AND DUTIES OF SUBCOMMITTEES

(a) Each subcommittee is authorized to meet, hold hearings, receive evidence, and report to the full committee on all matters referred to it or under its jurisdiction. Subcommittee chairmen shall set dates for hearings and meetings of their respective subcommittees after consultation with the chairman and other subcommittee chairmen with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of full committee and subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible.

(b) Whenever a subcommittee has ordered a bill, resolution, or other matter to be reported to the committee, the chairman of the subcommittee reporting the bill, resolution, or matter to the full committee, or any member authorized by the subcommittee to do so, may report such bill, resolution, or matter to the committee. It shall be the duty of the chairman of the subcommittee to report or cause to be reported promptly such bill, resolution, or matter, and to take or cause to be taken the necessary steps to bring such bill, resolution, or matter to a vote.

(c) In any event, the report of any subcommittee on a measure which has been approved by the subcommittee shall be filed within seven calendar days (exclusive of days on which the House is not in session) after the day on which there has been filed with the clerk of the committee a written request, signed by a majority of the members of the subcommittee, for the reporting of that measure. Upon the filing of any request, the clerk of the committee shall transmit immediately to the chairman of the subcommittee notice of the filing of that request.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES FOR THE 101ST CONGRESS

(Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the requirement of clause 2(a) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, I submit herewith the rules of the Committee on Ways and Means for the 101st Congress and ask that they be printed in the RECORD at this point. These rules were adopted by the committee in open session on January 4, 1989.

RULES OF THE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS FOR THE 101ST CONGRESS

Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, provides in part:

* * * The Rules of the House are the rules of its committees and subcommittees so far as applicable, except that a motion to recess from day to day and a motion to dispense with the first reading (in full) of a bill or resolution, if printed copies are available, are nondebatable motions of high privilege in committees and subcommittees.

* * * Each subcommittee of a committee is a part of that committee, and is subject to the authority and direction of that committee and to its rules as far as applicable.

* * * Each standing committee of the House shall adopt written rules governing its procedure. Such rules * * *

(1) shall be adopted in a meeting which is open to the public * * *

(2) shall be not inconsistent with the Rules of the House or with those provisions of law having the force and effect of Rules of the House * * *.

In accordance with the foregoing, the Committee on Ways and Means, on January 4, 1988, adopted the following as the Rules of the Committee for the 101st Congress.

A. GENERAL

Rule 1. Application of Rules

Except where the terms "full Committee" and "subcommittee" are specifically referred to, the following rules shall apply to the Committee on Ways and Means and its subcommittees as well as to the respective chairmen.

Rule 2. Meeting Date and Quorums

The regular meeting day of the Committee on Ways and Means shall be on the second Wednesday of each month while the House is in session. A majority of the Committee constitutes a quorum for business. Provided, however, that two members shall constitute a quorum at any regularly scheduled hearing called for the purpose of taking testimony and receiving evidence. In establishing a quorum for purposes of a public hearing, every effort shall be made to secure the presence of at least one member each from the majority and the minority.

The Chairman of the Committee may call and convene, as he considers necessary, additional meetings of the Committee for the consideration of any bill or resolution pending before the Committee or for the conduct of other Committee business. The Committee shall meet pursuant to the call of the chair.

Rule 3. Proxy Voting

Voting by proxy shall be permitted in accordance with the manner prescribed in clause 2(f) of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

Rule 4. Committee Budget

The Chairman, in consultation with the majority members of the Committee, shall, for each session of the Congress, prepare a preliminary budget. Such budget shall include necessary amounts for staff personnel, travel, investigation, and other expenses of the Committee. After consultation with the minority members, the Chairman shall include an amount budgeted to minority members for staff under their direction and supervision. Thereafter, the Chairman shall combine such proposals into a consolidated Committee budget, and shall present the same to the Committee for its approval or other action. The Chairman shall take whatever action is necessary to have the budget as finally approved by the Committee duly authorized by the House. After said budget shall have been adopted, no substantial change shall be made in such budget unless approved by the Committee.

Rule 5. Official Travel

Consistent with the primary expense resolution and such additional expense resolution as may have been approved, the provisions of this rule shall govern official travel of Committee members and Committee staff. Official travel to be reimbursed from funds set aside for the full Committee for any member or any Committee staff member shall be paid only upon the prior authorization of the Chairman. Official travel may be authorized by the Chairman for any member and any Committee staff member in connection with the attendance of formal or informal hearings conducted by the Committee, its subcommittees, or any other committee or subcommittee of the Congress on matters relevant to the general jurisdiction of the Committee, and meetings, conferences, facility inspections, and investigations which involve activities or subject matter relevant to the general jurisdiction of the Committee. Before such authorization is given there shall be submitted to the Chairman in writing the following:

(1) The purpose of the official travel;

(2) The dates during which the official travel is to be made and the date or dates of the event for which the official travel is being made;

(3) The location of the event for which the official travel is to be made;

(4) The names of members and Committee staff seeking authorization.

Where official travel is in connection with the conduct by members of the Committee of an informal hearing, the prior approval not only of the Chairman but also of subcommittee chairmen shall be required where the hearing involves any matter within the jurisdiction of one or more of the subcommittees of the Committee.

In the case of official travel of members and staff of a subcommittee to hearings, meetings, conferences, facility inspections and investigations involving activities or subject matter under the jurisdiction of such subcommittee to be paid for out of funds allocated to such subcommittee, prior authorization must be obtained from the subcommittee chairman and the Chairman. Such prior authorization shall be given by the Chairman only upon the representation by the applicable chairman of the subcommittee in writing setting forth those items enumerated above.

Within 60 days of the conclusion of any official travel authorized under this rule, there shall be submitted to the Chairman a written report covering the information gained as a result of the hearing, meeting, conference, facility inspection or investigation attended pursuant to such official travel.

B. SUBCOMMITTEES

Rule 6. Subcommittees

All matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means involving the Internal Revenue Code, except those revenue measures referred to subcommittees under paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, or 6, shall be considered by the full Committee and not in subcommittee.

There shall be six standing subcommittees as follows: a Subcommittee on Trade; a Subcommittee on Oversight; a Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures; a Subcommittee on Health; a Subcommittee on Social Security; and a Subcommittee on Human Resources.

The jurisdiction of such subcommittees shall be:

1. Subcommittee on Trade shall consist of 14 Members, 9 of whom shall be Democrats and 5 of whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Trade includes bills and matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to: customs and customs administration including tariff and import fee structure, classification, valuation of and special rules applying to imports, and special tariff provisions and procedures which relate to customs operation affecting exports and imports; import trade matters, including import impact, industry relief from injurious imports, adjustment assistance and programs to encourage competitive responses to imports, unfair import practices including antidumping and countervailing duty provisions, and import policy which relates to dependence on foreign sources of supply; commodity agreements and reciprocal trade agreements including multilateral and bilateral trade negotiations and implementation of agreements involving tariff and nontariff trade barriers to and distortions of international trade; international rules, organizations and institutional aspects of international trade agreements; budget authorizations for the U.S. Customs Service, the U.S. International Trade Commission, and U.S. Trade Representative; and special trade-related problems involving market access, competitive conditions of specific industries, export policy and promotion, access to materials in short supply, bilateral trade relations including trade with developing countries, operations of multinational corporations, and trade with nonmarket economies.

2. Subcommittee on Oversight shall consist of 11 Members, 7 of whom shall be Democrats and 4 of whom shall be Republicans.

The jurisdiction of this subcommittee includes all matters within the scope of the full Committee's jurisdiction but shall be limited to existing law and said oversight jurisdiction shall not be exclusive but shall be concurrent with that of the other subcommittees, and with respect to matters involving the Internal Revenue Code said concurrent jurisdiction shall be shared with the full Committee. 3. Subcommittee on Select Revenue Measures shall consist of 11 Members, 7 of whom shall be Democrats and 4 of whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Health includes bills and matters which are referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to programs which provide payments (from any source) for health care, health delivery systems, or health research. More specifically, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Health includes bills and matters which relate to the health care programs of the Social Security Act (including titles V, XI (Part B), XVIII, and XIX thereof) and, concurrent with the full Committee, tax credit and deduction provisions of the Internal Revenue Code dealing with health insurance premiums and health care costs.

5. Subcommittee on Social Security shall consist of 8 Members, 5 of whom shall be Democrats and 3 of whom shall be Republicans.

In general, the jurisdiction of the Subcommittee on Social Security includes bills and matters referred to the Committee on Ways and Means which relate to the Federal Old-Age, Survivors' and Disability Insurance System, the Railroad Retirement System, and employment taxes and trust fund operations relating to those systems. Rule 7. Subcommittee Chairmen Democratic members of the Committee shall have the right in order of full Committee seniority to bid for vacant subcommittee chairmanships. Such bids shall be subject to approval by a majority of those present and voting in the Democratic caucus of the Committee. If the caucus rejects a subcommittee chairmanship bid, the next senior majority Member may bid for the position as in the first instance. No member of the Committee who serves on the Budget Committee shall serve as a chairman of a subcommittee. A subcommittee chairmanship shall not be considered vacant while the subcommittee chairman has taken a leave of absence to serve on the Budget Committee.

Rule 8. Ex-Officio Members of Subcommittees

The Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member may sit as ex-officio members of all subcommittees. They may be counted for purposes of assisting in the establishment of a quorum for a subcommittee. However, their absence shall not count against the establishment of a quorum by the regular members of the subcommittee. Ex-officio members shall neither vote in the subcommittee nor be taken into consideration for purposes of determining the ratio of the subcommittee.

Rule 9. Subcommitee Ratios

The ratio of Democrats to Republicans on any subcommittee of the Committee shall be consistent with the ratio of Democrats to Republicans on the Committee.

Rule 10. Subcommittee Meetings

Insofar as possible, meetings of the Committee and its subcommittees shall not conflict. Subcommittee chairmen shall set meeting dates after consultation with the Chairman and other subcommittee chairmen with a view toward avoiding simultaneous scheduling of Committee and subcommittee meetings or hearings wherever possible.

Rule 11. Reference of Legislation and Subcommittee Reports

Every bill, or other matter (except bills concerning the Internal Revenue Code) referred to the Committee or initiated by the Committee shall be referred by the Chairman of the full Committee to the appropriate subcommittee within 2 weeks from the date of its receipt by the Committee unless by a majority vote in the full Committee, consideration is to be by the full Committee. A subcommittee shall, within 3 legislative days of receipt of a bill referral, acknowledge same to the full Committee.

After a bill has been pending in a subcommittee for a reasonable period of time, the Chairman of the full Committee may make a request in writing to the subcommittee that the subcommittee forthwith report the bill to the full Committee with its recommendations. If within 7 legislative days after the Chairman's written request, the subcommittee has not so reported the bill, then there shall be in order in the full Committee a motion to discharge the subcommittee from further consideration of the bill. If such motion is approved by a majority vote in the full Committee, the bill may thereafter be considered only by the full Committee.

No bill reported by a subcommittee shall be considered by the full Committee unless it has been presented to all members at least 2 legislative days prior to the meeting, together with a comparison with present law, a section-by-section analysis of the proposed change, a section-by-section justification, and a draft statement of the costs of carrying out the bill that is consistent with the requirements for reported bills under clause 7 of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives.

Rule 12. Recommendation for Appointment of Conferees

Whenever in the legislative process it becomes necessary to appoint conferees, the Chairman shall recommend to the Speaker as conferees the names of those members of the subcommittee (or subcommittees) which handled the substantive legislation in the order of their subcommittee seniority and such other Committee members as the Chairman may designate. In making recommendations of minority members as conferees the Chairman shall consult with the ranking minority member of the Committee.

C. HEARINGS

Rule 13. Witnesses

In order to assure the most productive use of the limited amount of time available to question hearing witnesses, a witness who is scheduled to appear before the Committee shall file with the clerk of the Committee at least 24 hours in advance of his appearance a written statement of his proposed testimony. In addition, all witnesses shall comply with the formatting requirements of the Joint Committee on Printing. Failure to comply with the 24-hour rule may result in the witness being denied the opportunity to testify in person. Failure to comply with the formatting requirements may result in a witness' statement being rejected for inclusion in the published hearing record. A witness shall limit his oral presentation to a summary of his position and shall provide sufficient copies of his written statement to the clerk for distribution to members, staff and news media.

Rule 14. Questioning of Witnesses

Committee members may question witnesses only when recognized by the Chairman for that purpose. All members shall be limited to five minutes on the initial round of questioning. In questioning witnesses under the five-minute rule, the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member may be recognized first after which members who are in attendance at the beginning of a hearing will be recognized in the order of their seniority on the Committee; other members shall be recognized in the order of their appearance at the hearing. In recognizing members to question witnesses, the Chairman may take into consideration the ratio of majority members to minority members and the number of majority and minority members present and shall apportion the recognition for questioning in such a manner as not to disadvantage the members of the majority.

Rule 15. Records of Hearings

An accurate stenographic record shall be kept of all testimony taken at a public hearing. The staff shall transmit to a witness the transcript of his testimony for correction and immediate return to the Committee office. Only changes in the interest of clarity, accuracy and corrections in transcribing errors will be permitted. Changes which substantially alter the actual testimony will not be permitted. Members shall correct their own testimony and return transcripts as soon as possible after receipt thereof. The Chairman may order the printing of the hearing without the corrections of a witness or member if he determines that a reasonable time has been afforded to make corrections and that further delay would impede the consideration of the legislative action which is the subject of the hearing.

A witness appearing in a public hearing, or submitting a statement for the record of a public hearing, or submitting a written comment in response to a published request for comments by the Committee must provide the Committee with a list of any clients or persons, or any organization for whom the witness appears which shall be made available for public inspection unless otherwise directed by the Committee. Verbal testimony and statements for the record, or written comment in response to a request for comments by the Committee, will be accepted only from citizens of the United States or corporations or associations organized under the laws of one of the 50 States of the United States or the District of Columbia, unless otherwise directed by the Chairman of the Committee or subcommittee involved. Written statements from noncitizens may be considered for acceptance if transmitted to the Committee in writing by Members of Congress.

Rule 16. Broadcasting of Hearings

The provisions of clause 3(f) of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives are by reference specifically made a part of these rules. In addition, the following policy with respect to media coverage of meetings shall be observed:

An appropriate area of the Committee's hearing room will be designated for members of the press and any equipment they use.

No interviews are allowed in the Committee room while the Committee is in session. Individual interviews must take place before the gavel falls for the convening of a meeting or after the gavel falls for adjournment.

Day-to-day notification of the next day's electronic coverage will be provided by the media to the Chairman through the chief counsel or some other person who might be designated in his absence.

Still photography will be permitted during a Committee meeting as long as it does not disrupt the proceedings or block the vision of Committee members or witnesses.

Klieg lights will be permitted to illuminate the hearing room only during the first fifteen minutes following the Chairman's initial calling of the Committee to order.

Further conditions may be specified by the Chairman.

D. MARKUPS

Rule 17. Record Votes

A record vote on an issue shall be required on the request of a member which is supported by at least one-fifth of a quorum (i.e., four members during the 101st Congress).

Rule 18. Reconsideration of Previous Vote

When an amendment has been disposed of, it shall be in order for any member on the prevailing side, on the same or next day on which a quorum of the Committee is present, to move the reconsideration thereof, and such motion shall take precedence over all other questions except the consideration of a motion to adjourn.

When a paragraph or section of a bill being considered for purposes of amendment has been adopted, it is not in order to return thereto except by majority vote of the Committee.

Rule 19. Previous Question

The Chairman shall not recognize a member for the purpose of moving the previous question unless the member has first advised the Chair and those members present that this is the purpose for which recognition is being sought.

Rule 20. Transcripts of Markups and Other Committee Meetings

An accurate stenographic transcript shall be kept of all markups and other meetings of the full Committee and the Subcommittee, whether they be open or closed to the public. This transcript, marked as "uncorrected," shall be available for inspection by Members of the House, or Members of the Committee together with their staffs, in the Committee or Subcommittee office. Transcripts shall not be removed from the Committee or Subcommittee office. If, however, (1) in the drafting of a Committee or Subcommittee decision, the Office of the House Legislative Counsel or (2) in the preparation of a Committee report, the Chief of Staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation determines (in consultation with appropriate majority and minority Committee staff) that it is necessary to review the transcript of a markup, such transcript may be released upon the signature and to the custody of an appropriate Committee staff person. Such transcript shall be returned immediately after its review in the drafting session.

A transcript of a markup or Committee meeting other than a public hearing shall not be published or made public in any way except by a majority vote of the Committee. Before any public release of the uncorrected transcript, members must be given a reasonable opportunity to correct their remarks. In instances in which a stenographic transcript is kept of a conference committee proceedings, all of the requirements of this rule will likewise be observed.

Rule 21. Publication of Decisions and Legislative Language

A press release describing any tentative or final decision made by the full Committee or a Subcommittee on legislation under consideration shall be made available to each member of the Committee as soon as possible, but no later than the next day. However, the legislative draft of any tentative or final decision of the full Committee or a Subcommittee shall not be publicly released until such draft is made available to each member of the Committee.

Rule 22. Availability of Committee Records

The records of the Committee at the National Archives and Records Administration shall be made available for public use in accordance with Rule XXXVI of the Rules of the House of Representatives. The Chairman shall notify the Ranking Minority Member of any decision, pursuant to clause 3(b)(3) or clause 4(b) of the rule, to withhold a record otherwise available, and the matter shall be presented to a Committee for a determination on the written request of any Member of the Committee.

E. STAFF

Rule 23. Supervision of Committee Staff

The staff of the Committee, both professional and clerical, shall be under the general supervision and direction of the Chairman of the full Committee except as provided in clause 5(d) and clause 6 of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives concerning committee expenses and staff; provided, however, that the chairman of each subcommittee shall be entitled to select and designate at least one professional and one clerical staff member for the subcommittee subject to the approval of a majority of the Democratic Members of the full Committee. The Ranking Minority Member shall have the right to designate one staff member. Said staff members shall be compensated at a salary commensurate with the responsibilities prescribed by the subcommittee chairman. Compensation shall be provided out of appropriated amounts rather than statutory amounts allowed each Committee.

Rule 24. Staff Honoraria, Speaking Engagements, and Unofficial Travel

This rule shall apply to all majority and minority staff of the Committee and its Subcommittees.

a. Honoraria.—Under no circumstances shall a staff person accept the offer of an honorarium. This prohibition includes the direction of an honorarium to a charity.

b. Speaking engagements and unofficial travel.—

(1) Advance approval required.—In the case of all speaking engagements, fact-finding trips, and other unofficial travel, a staff person must receive approval by the full Committee Chairman (or, in the case of the minority staff, from the Ranking Minority Member) at least seven calendar days prior to the event.

(2) Request for approval.—A request for approval must be submitted in writing to the full Committee Chairman (or, where appropriate, the Ranking Minority Member) in connection with each speaking engagement or fact-finding trip. Such request must contain the following information:

(b) the nature of the event, including any relevant information regarding attendees at such event;

(c) in the case of a speaking engagement, the subject of the speech and duration of staff travel, if any; and

(d) in the case of a fact-finding trip, a description of the proposed itinerary and proposed agenda of substantive issues to be discussed, as well as a justification of the relevance and importance of the fact-finding trip to the staff member's official duties.

(3) Reasonable travel and lodging expenses.—After receipt of the advanced approval described in (1) above, a staff person may accept reimbursement by an appropriate sponsoring organization of reasonable travel and lodging expenses associated with a speaking engagement or fact-finding trip related to official duties, provided such reimbursement is consistent with the Rules of the House of Representatives. (In lieu of reimbursement after the event, expenses may be paid directly by an appropriate sponsoring organization.) The reasonable travel and lodging expenses of a spouse (but not children) may be reimbursed (or directly paid) by an appropriate sponsoring organization consistent with the Rules of the House of Representatives.

(4) Fact-finding trip summary and report.—In the case of any reimbursement or direct payment associated with a fact-finding trip, a staff person must submit, within 60 days after such trip, a report summarizing the trip and listing all expenses reimbursed or directly paid by the sponsoring organization. This information shall be submitted to the Chairman (and, in the case of minority staff, to the Ranking Minority Member).

c. Waiver.—The Chairman (or, where appropriate, the Ranking Minority Member) may waive the application of section (b) of this rule upon a showing of good cause.

In the case of any meeting of the committee, other than a regularly scheduled meeting, the clerk of the committee shall notify every member of the committee of the time and place of the meeting and shall give reasonable notice which, except in extraordinary circumstances, shall be at least 24 hours in advance of any meeting held in Washington, D.C., and at least 48 hours in the case of any meeting held outside Washington, D.C.

2. PREPARATIONS FOR COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Under direction of the chairman, designated committee staff members shall brief members of the committee at a time sufficiently prior to any committee or subcommittee meeting to assist the committee members in preparation for such meeting and to determine any matter which the committee members might wish considered during the meeting. The staff director shall recommend to the chairman the testimony, papers, and other materials to be presented to the committee or subcommittee at any meeting. The determination whether such testimony, papers, and other materials shall be presented in open or executive session shall be made pursuant to the Rules of the House and these rules.

3. MEETING PROCEDURES

Meetings of the committee and its subcommittees shall be open to the public except that a portion or portions of any such meeting may be closed to the public if the committee or subcommittee, as the case may be, determines by record vote in open session and with a majority present that the matters to be discussed or the testimony to be taken at such portion or portions:

1. Will disclose matters necessary to be kept secret in the interests of national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States;

2. Will relate solely to matters of committee staff personnel or internal staff management or procedure;

3. Will tend to charge an individual with crime or misconduct, to disgrace or injure the professional standing of an individual, or otherwise to expose an individual to public contempt or obloquy, or will represent a clearly unwarranted invasion of the privacy of an individual except that, at a hearing which may tend to defame, degrade or incriminate any person, the hearing may be closed to the public consistent with clause 2(g)(2) and clause 2(k)(5) of Rule XI of the Rules of the House;

4. Will disclose the identity of any informer or law enforcement agent or will disclose any information relating to the investigation or prosecution of a criminal offense that is required to be kept secret in the interests of effective law enforcement; or

(A) an act of Congress requires the information to be kept confidential by Government officers and employees; or

(B) the information has been obtained by the Government on a confidential basis, other than through an application by such person for a specific Government financial or other benefit, and is required to be kept secret in order to prevent undue injury to the competitive position of such person.

6. Will violate any other law of the United States or any rule of the House of Representatives.

Except for purposes of taking testimony or receiving evidence, for which purposes a quorum shall consist of two committee members, a quorum for the transaction of any other committee business shall consist of ten committee members. Decisions of the committee shall be by majority vote of the members present and voting.

Whenever the committee by rollcall vote reports any measure or matter, the report of the committee upon such measure or matter shall include a tabulation of the votes cast in favor of and the votes cast in opposition to such measure or matter.

4. PROCEDURES RELATED TO THE TAKING OF TESTIMONY

Notice.—Reasonable notice shall be given to all witnesses appearing before the committee.

Oath or Affirmation.—Testimony of witnesses shall be given under oath or affirmation which may be administered by any member of the committee, except that the chairman of the committee or of any subcommittee shall not require an oath or affirmation where the chairman determines that it would not be appropriate under the circumstances.

Interrogation.—Committee or subcommittee interrogation shall be conducted by members of the committee and such committee staff as are authorized by the chairman or the presiding member.

Counsel for the Witness.—(A) Any witness may be accompanied by counsel. A witness who is unable to obtain counsel may inform the committee of such fact. If the witness informs the committee of this fact at least 24 hours prior to the witness' appearance before the committee, the committee shall then endeavor to obtain voluntary counsel for the witness. Failure to obtain such counsel will not excuse the witness from appearing and testifying.

(B) Counsel shall conduct themselves in an ethical and professional manner. Failure to do so shall, upon a finding to that effect by a majority of the members of the committee, a majority being present, subject such counsel to disciplinary action which may include censure, removal, or a recommendation of contempt proceedings, except that the chairman of the committee or of a subcommittee may temporarily remove counsel during proceedings before the committee or subcommittee unless a majority of the members of the committee or subcommittee, a majority being present, vote to reverse the ruling of the chair.

(C) There shall be no direct or cross-examination by counsel. However, counsel may submit in writing any question counsel wishes propounded to a client or to any other witness and may, at the conclusion of such testimony, suggest the presentation of other evidence or the calling of other witnesses. The committee or subcommittee may use such questions and dispose of such suggestions as it deems appropriate.

Statements by Witnesses.—A witness may make a statement, which shall be brief and relevant, at the beginning and conclusion of the witness' testimony. Such statements shall not exceed a reasonable period of time as determined by the chairman, or other presiding member. Any witness desiring to make a prepared or written statement for the record of the proceedings shall file a copy with the clerk of the committee, and insofar as practicable and consistent with the notice given, shall do so at least 72 hours in advance of the witness' appearance before the committee.

Objections and Ruling.—Any objection raised by a witness or counsel shall be ruled upon by the chairman or other presiding member, and such ruling shall be the ruling of the committee unless a majority of the committee present overrules the ruling of the chair.

Transcripts.—A transcript shall be made of the testimony of each witness appearing before the committee or any subcommittee during a committee or subcommittee hearing.

Inspection and Correction.—All witnesses testifying before the committee or any subcommittee shall be given a reasonable opportunity to inspect the transcript of their testimony to determine whether such testimony was correctly transcribed. The witness may be accompanied by counsel. Any corrections the witness desires to make in the transcript shall be submitted in writing to the committee within 5 days from the date when the transcript was made available to the witness. Corrections shall be limited to grammar and minor editing, and may not be made to change the substance of the testimony. Any questions arising with respect to such corrections shall be decided by the chairman. Upon request, those parts of testimony given by a witness in executive session which are subsequently quoted or made part of a public record shall be made available to that witness at the witness' expense.

Requests to Testify.—The committee or any subcommittee will consider requests to testify on any matter or measure pending before the committee or subcommittee. A person who believes that testimony or other evidence presented at a public hearing, or any comment made by a committee member or a member of the committee staff may tend to affect adversely that person's reputation, may request to appear personally before the committee to testify on his or her own behalf, or may file a sworn statements of facts relevant to the testimony, evidence, or comment, or may submit to the chairman proposed questions in writing for the cross-examination of other witnesses. The committee shall take such actions as it deems appropriate.

Contempt Procedures.—No recommendation that a person be cited for contempt of Congress shall be forwarded to the House unless and until the committee has, upon notice to all its members, met and considered the alleged contempt, afforded the person an opportunity to state in writing or in person why he or she should not be held in contempt, and agreed, by majority vote of the committee to forward such recommendation to the House.

Release of Name of Witness.—At the request of any witness, the name of that witness scheduled to be heard by the committee shall not be released prior to, or after, the witness' appearance before the committee, unless otherwise authorized by the chairman.

Closing hearings.—A vote to close a committee or subcommittee hearing may not be taken by less than a majority of the committee or the subcommittee pursuant to clause 4 of House Rule XLVIII unless at least one member of the minority is present to vote upon a motion to close the hearing.

5. SUBCOMMITTEES

Creation of subcommittees shall be by majority vote of the committee. Subcommittees shall deal with such legislation and oversight of programs and policies as the committee may direct. The subcommittees shall be governed by the rules of the committee.

Except for purposes of taking testimony or receiving evidence, for which purposes a quorum shall consist of two subcommittee members, a quorum for the transaction of any other subcommittee business shall consist of five subcommittee members.

There are hereby established the following subcommittees:

(1) Program and Budget Authorization.
(2) Legislation.
(3) Oversight and Evaluation.

6. INVESTIGATIONS

(1) at the direction of the chairman of the full committee, with notice to the ranking minority member of the full committee; or

(2) at the written request to the chairman of the full committee of at least five members of the committee, except that any investigation initiated under (1) or (2) must be brought to the attention of the full committee for approval at the next regular meeting of the full committee following initiation of the investigation. Authorized investigations may be conducted by members of the committee and/or by designated committee staff members.

7. SUBPOENAS

Unless otherwise determined by the committee, the chairman, upon consultation with the ranking minority member, or the committee, shall authorize and issue subpoenas. Subpoenas for the attendance of witnesses or the production of memoranda, documents, records or any other material may be issued by the chairman, or any member of the committee designated by the chairman, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman or member issuing the subpoenas. Each subpoena shall have attached thereto a copy of these rules.

8. STAFF

For the purpose of these rules, committee staff means employees of the committee, consultants to the committee, employees of other Government agencies detailed to the committee, or any other person engaged by contract or otherwise to perform services for or at the request of the committee.

The appointment of committee staff shall be by the chairman in consultation with the ranking minority member. After confirmation, the chairman shall certify committee staff appointments to the Clerk of the House in writing.

The committee staff works for the committee as a whole, under the supervision of the chairman of the committee. Except as otherwise provided by the committee, the duties of committee staff shall be performed and committee staff personnel affairs and day-to-day operations, including security and control of classified documents and material, shall be administered under the direct supervision and control of the staff director.

The committee staff shall assist the minority as fully as the majority in all matters of committee business and in the preparation and filing of additional, separate and minority views, to the end that all points of view may be fully considered by the committee and the House.

The members of the committee staff shall not discuss either the classified substance or procedure of the work of the committee with any person not a member of the committee or the committee staff for any purpose or in connection with any proceeding, judicial or otherwise, either during that person's tenure as a member of the committee staff or at any time thereafter except as directed by the committee in accordance with clause 7 of House Rule XLVIII and the provisions of these rules, or, in the event of the termination of the committee, in such a manner as may be determined by the House.

No member of the committee staff shall be employed by the committee unless and until such a member of the committee staff agrees in writing, as a condition of employment, not to divulge any classified information which comes into such person's possession while a member of the committee staff or any classified information which comes into such person's possession by virtue of his or her position as a member of the committee staff to any person not a member of the committee or the committee staff, either while a member of the committee staff or at any time thereafter except as directed by the committee in accordance with clause 7 of House Rule XLVIII and the provisions of these rules, or in the event of the termination of the committee, in such manner as may be determined by the House.

No member of the committee staff shall be employed by the committee unless and until such a member of the committee staff agrees in writing, as a condition of employment, to notify the committee, or, in the event of the committee's termination, the House, of any request for testimony, either while a member of the committee staff or at any time thereafter with respect to classified information which came into the staff member's possession by virtue of his or her position as a member of the committee staff. Such classified information shall not be disclosed in response to such requests except as directed by the committee in accordance with clause 7 of House Rule XLVIII and the provisions of these rules, or in the event of the termination of the committee, in such manner as may be determined by the House.

The committee shall immediately consider disciplinary action to be taken in case any member of the committee staff fails to conform to any of these rules. Such disciplinary action may include, but shall not be limited to, immediate dismissal from the committee staff.

9. RECEIPT OF CLASSIFIED MATERIAL

In the case of any information classified under established security procedures and submitted to the committee by the executive or legislative branch, the committee's acceptance of such information shall constitute a decision by the committee that it is executive session material and shall not be disclosed publicly or released unless the committee, by rollcall vote, determines, in a manner consistent with clause 7 of House Rule XLVIII, that it should be disclosed publicly or otherwise released. For purposes of receiving information from either the executive or legislative branch, the committee staff may accept information on behalf of the committee.

10. PROCEDURES RELATED TO CLASSIFIED OR SENSITIVE MATERIAL

(a) Committee staff offices shall operate under strict security precautions. At least one security officer shall be on duty at all times by the entrance to control entry. Before entering the office all persons shall identify themselves.

Sensitive or classified documents and material shall be segregated in a security storage area. They may be examined only at secure reading facilities. Copying, duplicating, or removal from the committee offices of such documents and other materials are prohibited except as is necessary for use in, or preparation for, interviews or committee meetings, including the taking of testimony in conformity with these rules.

Each member of the committee shall at all times have access to all papers and other material received from any source. The staff director shall be responsible for the maintenance, under appropriate security procedures, of a registry which will number and identify all classified papers and other classified materials in the possession of the committee and such registry shall be available to any member of the committee.

(b) Pursuant to clause (7)(c)(2) of House Rule XLVIII and to clause (2)(e)(2) and clause 2(g)(2) of House Rule XI, members who are not members of the committee shall be granted access to such hearings, records, data, charts and files of the committee and be admitted on a nonparticipatory basis to hearings of the committee which involve classified material, on the basis of the following provisions:

(1) Members who desire to examine materials in the possession of the committee or to attend committee hearings on a nonparticipatory basis should notify the clerk of the committee in writing.

(2) Each such request by a member must be considered by the committee, a quorum being present, at the earliest practicable opportunity. The committee must determine by record vote whatever action it deems necessary in light of all the circumstances of each individual request. The committee shall take into account, in its deliberations, such considerations as the sensitivity of the information sought to the national defense or the confidential conduct of the foreign relations of the United States, the likelihood of its being directly or indirectly disclosed, the jurisdictional interest of the member making the request and such other concerns—constitutional or otherwise—as affect the public interest of the United States. Such actions as the committee may take include, but are not limited to: (i) approving the request, in whole or part; (ii) denying the request; (iii) providing in different form than requested information or material which is the subject of the request.

(3) In matters touching on such requests, the committee may, in its discretion, consult the Director of Central Intelligence and such other officials as it may deem necessary.

(4) In the event that the member making the request in question does not accede to the determination or any part thereof of the committee as regards the request, that member should notify the committee in writing of the grounds for such disagreement. The committee shall subsequently consider the matter and decide, by record vote, what further action or recommendation, if any, it will take.

(c) Pursuant to Section 501 of the National Security Act of 1947 (50 U.S.C. 413) and to clauses 3(a) and 7(c)(2) of House Rule XLVIII, the committee shall call to the attention of the House or to any other appropriate committee or committees of the House any matters requiring the attention of the House or such other committee or committees of the House on the basis of the following provisions:

(1) At the request of any member of the committee, the committee shall meet at the earliest practicable opportunity to consider a suggestion that the committee call to the attention of the House or any other committee or committees of the House executive session material.

(2) In determining whether any matter requires the attention of the House or any other committee or committees of the House, the committee shall consider, among such other matters it deems appropriate—

(A) the effect of the matter in question upon the national defense or the foreign relations of the United States;

SENATE—Tuesday, February 7, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 2:15 p.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful. But his delight is in the law of the Lord; and in his law doth he meditate day and night. And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper. The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away. Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous. For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish. Psalm 1.

Gracious God, our Heavenly Father, may we heed to the wisdom of Psalm 1. Give us eyes to see, ears to hear, hearts to receive, and wills to take seriously the truth of God. Help us, Lord. Amen.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of proceedings be approved to date.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the House-passed joint resolution disapproving the pay raise at 2:30 p.m.; that there be 30 minutes of debate on the resolution, to be equally divided between the majority and Republican leaders or their designees, and that no amendments or motions be in order during the consideration of the joint resolution; provided further that without any intervening business, a vote occur on the joint resolution at 3 p.m. today, with paragraph 4 of rule XII being waived.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. That will be the order of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that the vote on final passage of the joint resolution be for a time not to exceed 45 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 12 NOON TOMORROW—MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 12 noon on Wednesday, February 8, and that on Wednesday, following the time for the two leaders, there be a period of morning business not to exceed 2 hours with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the information of all Senators, it is my intention today, following the vote on the pay resolution, which should end not later than 3:45 p.m., to have a period for the transaction of morning business within which Senators will be permitted to speak for up to 5 minutes each and introduce legislation and make other inserts; to have a similar period tomorrow, as has already been agreed to, and following that period to go to the nomination of Clayton Yeutter to be Secretary of Agriculture, in the event that it is ready for action by the full Senate, with a vote thereon to occur sometime at or prior to 3 p.m. tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. LEAHY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the majority leader yielded the floor?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

THE YEUTTER NOMINATION

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I do not mean to step in on the leaders. I noted the distinguished leader mentioned the Yeutter nomination. We have just completed, as the distinguished Republican leader knows as a member of the committee, the vote in committee which was unanimous for Mr. Yeutter. And I am going to put in the appropriate paperwork this afternoon on him.

It would be certainly my intention, and I know Senator LUGAR's, the ranking member, intention to ask tomorrow that we go forward with that. I think the schedule that the leader has proposed is an excellent one. Once we make sure that all final paperwork is done we will be ready to go.

Mr. MITCHELL. If I might ask the Senator from Vermont then to be prepared to proceed with the Yeutter nomination at 2 p.m. tomorrow.

Mr. LEAHY. I will be prepared, I might say. Whatever time the leadership wants we will be prepared, and we will be here.

RECOGNITION OF THE REPUBLICAN LEADER

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader.

THE YEUTTER NOMINATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, while the chairman of the Agriculture Committee is on the floor, I understand the only condition being if there are answers to written questions that they be submitted by then; is that correct?

Mr. LEAHY. I might say, Mr. President, to the distinguished Senator from Kansas, that there were a couple of Members who wanted a little bit more detail on some written questions. I anticipate no difficulty in those answers getting in here nor do the Members who are asking for it. That is the only thing pending.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the Senator from Vermont. We will alert Mr. Yeutter to make certain those questions have been addressed, because it is important to have this nomination confirmed.

JOINT RESOLUTION OF DISAPPROVAL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for his cooperation in getting a unanimous-consent agreement on the disapproval resolution. I think all Members on both sides will be voting now for a second time on pretty much the same resolution, and vote probably pretty much the same, 19 to 1, or something like that, against the pay increase.

I would hope that the President, President Bush, might, when he signs the resolution of disapproval—maybe sometime later this week, and he will be addressing Congress Thursday evening—indicate that he does believe a pay raise is in order for the executive branch, the judicial branch, and then maybe leave it up to the Members. If we cannot agree, we cannot agree.

But I can say, as I said—and I think the majority leader said last week when we debated this issue—there are a number of people in the executive branch and many judges in this country, and many potential judges, who I think merit the pay raise—not 51 percent, but a reasonable increase. And I hope the President of the United States might address that and make his wishes known.

I do not think he is unwilling to do that. Some Members would say, "Well, don't decouple. If we decouple it, there will never be a raise for Members of Congress." Others believe just the contrary—that, if others have the increase, sooner or later Members of Congress might have a reasonable increase, again not 50 percent.

There are four-star generals in the service of their country who are receiving two-star pay. In fact, many two-star generals are receiving less because they are not allowed to make more than Members of Congress. I do not think that is fair. So we should not punish anyone in the military, or the executive branch, or the judicial branch because we are not able to agree on our own pay.

It is a very difficult question—to agree on any raise for Members of Congress, and there are some in this body who would vote against a 1-percent raise, or a 2-percent raise for Members. Others would not.

I think we would have a majority for a reasonable pay increase but I do believe that 51 percent—as many have indicated, and as I have indicated—was too much to swallow, and the American people spoke. The House responded. And now we will do the same here in a few moments.

OTHER ISSUES

It seems to me it is in our interest to get this issue behind us and move on to issues of great importance. The S&L proposal presented by President Bush is a big step in the right direction. It is met with I think fairly bipartisan support. It has had support from the business sector, from banks and S&L's, and others in the business sector. I suggest Congress may make some changes. There is a rather heavy public exposure—$40 billion over 10 years. It is going to come from the taxpayers. It is a lot of money.

Some will want to see if we cannot shrink that, but it seems to me based on the discussion we had in our policy luncheon at noon that everybody knows that is a very difficult problem—and they generally support the President for biting the bullet, making the tough decision, and not only that, before he made it he consulted with Members of Congress, both Republicans, Democrats, and other people who were experts in the matter. That was certainly well received in the Republican policy luncheon.

THE TOWER NOMINATION

So we are prepared. It would also be my hope that some time this week we could take up the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. We have a recess next week. The Tower nomination has been pending. It is my understanding that the latest FBI report based on latest rumors is now available to the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, and will be in writing later this afternoon. We have had an oral report. Most of the charges are groundless. Others were certainly not grounds for disqualification.

OTHER NOMINATIONS

I would hope that we might be able to make a final judgment on that nomination this week and then that leaves still others where reports are not yet ready. The Energy Secretary nominee, Admiral Watkins, and the HHS nominee, Dr. Sullivan—there may be a hearing this week on that nomination in the Finance Committee. That would still leave our former colleague, Congressman Edward Derwinksi, for Veterans' Affairs, and Mr. Bennett for the so-called drug czar. I think every other nomination has been handled expeditiously. I congratulate the majority leader for that.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL PAY RATE RECOMMENDATIONS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2:30 p.m. having arrived, under the order previously entered the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 129, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 129) disapproving the increase in executive, legislative, and judicial salaries recommended by the President under Section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Time is controlled by the two leaders or their designees.

Who yields time?

Time is running and is equally divided and equally charged.

What is the will of the Senate?

Mr. DOLE. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I think this pay raise matter has come to a resolution that is pleasing to the American people. Both Houses are voting. I long have said that one of the key complaints is that under this automatic procedure, a pay raise could go forward without a vote in the two Houses of Congress. I think that the agitation around the country and the radio talk shows and so forth came about, in part, because of this automatic quadrennial procedure.

It was my pleasure to be on one of those talk shows with the former Speaker of the House, Tip O'Neill, and it was my assessment that perhaps the quadrennial procedure was an appropriate idea at the time, but since then the American people have made it clear that they want Congress to vote on its pay.

Also, this procedure provided for a 50-percent increase in one jump, and the American people clearly spoke and said that they did not want that. I was proud to be the author, along with Senator GRASSLEY, of a proposal that passed here in the Senate last week disapproving this pay raise and requiring a vote on future congressional raises.

It is my sincerest belief that the passage of that resolution in this body, by a vote of 95 to 5, resulted in increased pressure on the House to vote.

I know that many in the Government had hoped for an increase, but the fact of the matter is that until we deal with the deficit that we have before us, we should not start the year with a 50-percent pay increase. The Senate will vote in a few minutes on this matter. I expect us to overwhelmingly agree with the House. I also expect that the President will sign this resolution today.

It is my contention that we should not consider a pay increase this year. There may be a time when a pay raise is in order, but certainly it should not be 50 percent. It should be done with a vote under our regular procedures, and it should be done in a timely fashion—perhaps if we have moved toward a balanced budget or have a balanced budget, if it is tied to cost of living, or some plan along those lines. But I do not think that we can ever move a pay raise under this quadrennial automatic commission.

The American people have spoken, and I am very happy with the outcome.

Mr. President, I applaud the House of Representatives for voting to disapprove the pay raises for Members of Congress, senior Federal officials, and Federal judges. Given the overwhelming vote last week on my amendment to dissapprove this pay raise, I am confident the Senate will reaffirm its position on this excessive pay hike proposal.

A pay raise is inappropriate at this time. It would have been a big mistake for us to start this Congress with a 50-percent pay increase. Difficult choices must be made on where to cut spending. I sincerely believe the public will accept these cuts more readily when this pay raise proposal finally is stopped.

Mr. President, I am very pleased that the House accepted our proposal. But I still believe we need to go further in reforming the process by which these raises currently are allowed to go into effect. We should require a vote on future congressional pay raises. Unfortunately, down the road, I believe we will find ourselves in the same predicament as we are in today unless the procedure is changed. The American people have expressed their outrage over automatic congressional pay raises. Backdoor pay raises do not hold Members accountable. It is time for Congress to fix permanently the questionable methods Congress uses to increase its pay.

I will not press my amendment again today. I do not want to jeopardize this opportunity to stop the raises. However, I will continue working with our distinguished colleagues, Senators GRASSLEY, DECONCINI, HELMS, HUMPHREY, MCCAIN, and others until we have true reform.

Mr. President, today is a victory for the American taxpayers. Eighty-five percent of the public opposed the proposed pay raise. It is encouraging that Congress, in truly democratic fashion, has listened to the voters and represented them well by defeating this pay raise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. DOLE. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, today a tidal wave of democracy is sweeping over the Federal Government, and that is despite the original intentions of the U.S. Congress. For today, as we adopt this resolution, which I feel we will, we indeed do the will of the people.

Unfortunately, though, the people had to speak pretty loud before Congress finally opened its ears. The vote of the House is now behind us, an overwhelming vote of 380 to 40. I am confident that the Senate will repeat its overwhelming vote of last Thursday night to also reject the Pay Commission's recommendations.

I am also confident that the President will sign the resolution of disapproval. Several weeks ago, I wrote to President Bush and urged him to oppose the 51 percent pay raise. I expect very much that he will make the responsible choice and join with the 85 percent of the American people who also oppose this 51-percent pay raise.

It will be much easier for Congress and the administration to say yes to budget cuts this session, when we have first said no the 51-percent pay raise.

As an Iowa newspaper editor wrote, "It is too bad that Congress doesn't put as much energy and creativity into solving the problems of our country as they do in giving themselves a pay raise."

Mr. President, that may be a very harsh comment, but I do think it expresses the feeling that I sense out there in the grassroots. Maybe if we can channel that energy into deficit reduction, we can balance the budget, and I think we will by 1993.

Then we set the stage, because we do things in a businesslike fashion, or at least that is one way of showing that we do. We then have earned a pay raise. With the pending pay increase behind us, Congress must finish the business of pay reform. The current process is not only awkward but also demeaning. I certainly do not want to go through this again. So we must fix a process that does not work—and the public does not seem to tolerate it—by correcting the law so that a vote from Congress is required on future pay proposals, and public faith will be restored.

Mr. President, I congratulate my colleagues in this body and the other body for taking what I expect will be bold and absolutely correct action. Consequently, I urge this body to vote "yes" on House Joint Resolution 129.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the problem with this whole gambit is that it was an attempt to do the wrong thing at the wrong time in the wrong way.

There is an old adage: "You can lead a horse to water, but you cannot make him drink." The American people, by expressing their outrage over this 51 percent pay increase, have made a lot of people drink. That is good. They proved that you can fight city hall, that you can take on the Congress of the United States despite all of its legerdermain and all of its little legislative tricks.

Maybe now we can go back to the drawing board, reconsider the pay raise issue, and this time do it right.

Whatever the argument may be for raises for anybody, judges or other officials of this Government, trying to force through automatic pay increases was not the right way to do it.

The people understood that; they spoke. The House reacted yesterday, and the Senate shortly, I am confident, will support a resolution of disapproval.

I think this has been a good exercise in democracy, and I hope that we all have learned something from it. I say again that now we have an opportunity to go back and reconsider this issue of Federal salaries and this time to do it right.

I yield back the remainder of my time and I thank the leader for granting me the time.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the upcoming vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

ORDER FOR PERIOD FOR MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following the vote there be a period of morning business not to exceed 2 hours with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I know of no further requests for time on this side.

I think the issue is clear. We have read about it in the papers. It has been on a few radio programs and a few television programs. There has been a lot of mail on the issue. I think the American people, as I indicated, indicated their desire.

In our policy luncheon we asked for a show of hands on different things. One thing was fairly clear; nobody raised their hand for a pay cut.

So I hope we will just go on as we have been doing without any reduction in any honoraria. I think we can make certain, each one of us, that we are not in any way influenced because we make a speech to some group and are paid for it.

So I would guess the point I would make from the Republican policy luncheon is I think most Senators—in fact nearly every Senator—said let us get this pay thing behind us; let us vote for the resolution; let us disapprove it; let us reject it.

Many thought we ought to go ahead then and recommend some increase for executive officials, those who were mentioned in this pay raise, and certain military officials and judges.

But I would say for the record that not a single person who I saw at the luncheon wanted anyone to reduce the pay.

We were not entitled to a raise but we are not entitled to a reduction, either. It seems to me that is the consensus of our meeting.

I will just indicate I think most Members feel rather strongly about it. I would hope that we will have some bipartisan support if that battle should come to the floor where there is an effort to reduce what Members are paid.

I yield back the remainder of the time on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Under the order the vote will occur at 3 p.m. with Senators yielding back time.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum has been suggested.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 minutes on the matter at hand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator may proceed until the hour of 3 p.m.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, it occurs to me, as we reflect on the lengthy debate on the matter before us, that if this body had made the decisions as we went along to take the COLA's as they were originally authorized back in 1975, we probably would not be here today debating the issue on the justification of salary increases for Members of Congress as well as the judiciary and the other specified Federal offices.

I have had an opportunity to prepare a 10-year formula of just what the cost-of-living allowances added to the salary of Members of Congress would have been. I think it is interesting to note, Mr. President, that today Members of Congress under this formula would be receiving $117,842.00.

I ask unanimous consent that a table highlighting the COLA's we have given to Federal employees and their effect on our salaries had we taken them, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Year	COLA given to Federal employees (percent)	Amount equal to percent of Members salary	Congressional salary assuming COLA increase
1976	4.8	$2,140	$46,740
1977 [1]	28.9	13,508	60,248
1977	7.05	4,247	64,495
1978	5.5	3,547	68,042
1979	7.02	4,776	72,818
1980	9.11	6,633	79,451
1981	4.8	3,813	83,264
1982	4.0	3,330	86,594
1983	4.0	3,463	90,057
1984	3.5	3,152	93,209
1986	3.0	2,796	96,005
1987	2.0	1,920	97,925
1987 [1]	15.6	15,276	113,201
1988	4.1	4,641	117,842

[1] Note: 1977 figure of 28.9 percent and 1987 figure of 15.6 percent reflect President's recommendation with respect to results of the Commission on Executive, Legislative and Judicial Salaries—these recommendations were accepted.

Also, chart based on 1975 salary of $44,600 (which includes a 5 percent COLA).

Members accepted full COLA in 1975, 1983, 1984 and 1986 partial COLA of 5.5 percent accepted in 1979.

Information prepared by Congressional Research Service.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, the reality of these automatic cost-of-living adjustments speak for themselves. The very fact that we see fit to authorize them and pass them on and exclude ourselves bears, I think, the examination of the wisdom of those decisions during that period of time.

So, I would simply remind my colleagues, as we look to the alternatives—because this subject obviously is not going to go away; it is not going to be abandoned—perhaps we should give thought to rectifying the situation and recognizing the equity that if, indeed, it is appropriate that we recognize cost-of-living allowances, for other Federal employees, we also recognize the same principle for Member of Congress, member of the judiciary and others who appropriately should receive this consideration.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, I will be voting against the resolution before us today but I want to be sure that my vote is not misinterpreted.

The vote last Thursday did three important things. As last Thursday, this resolution disapproves an excessive pay raise. I still agree with this.

However, last Thursday, we also made a clear statement that a raise for the judiciary should not be tied to the legislative branch and should be considered separately. In addition, we made a clear policy statement that any pay raise to us ought to be offset by a like reduction in honoraria. This resolution does not do these last two things. I am voting no to make it clear that I have not changed my position on these important issues.

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, this is the hour that many of my colleagues hoped would never arrive. A strategy that many had counted on to put the President's pay recommendations into effect without a vote in the other body has unraveled. We are forced to yet again to face the consequences of our own historic inability to justify and vote for an increase in the salary of top Federal officials, including the Congress.

We can argue among ourselves about the strategy that was pursued and the results of its failure. But I happen to believe it is the responsibility of Senators and Representatives—a responsibility to our constituents—to be on record on issues as controversial as our own pay, however difficult that may sometimes be. I have gone on record, I have spelled out my reasoning on this matter, and I have cast my vote—as I will vote again today.

I have said that I consider the President's recommended pay increase excessive; that this is not the year for Congress to be granting itself a substantial raise. I have said, however, that I would support the President's recommendation as an important step toward curbing the influence of special interests and resolving the fundamental question of who pays Congress, and as a means to attract and retain the highest talent in the Federal judiciary and the senior executive service. I have said further that, should the raise and the related honorarium ban go into effect, I would return to the Treasury this year the difference between the new salary level and my current pay, which is made up of my congressional salary and the speaking fees allowed under Senate rules.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that this would be the year Congress would look itself and the country squarely in the eye and correct a two-source pay system nobody likes and nobody believes serves the public interest. I had hoped that we would resolve to pay public servants solely from public funds. Sadly, I was wrong.

With today's vote, which everyone knows will be a lopsided rejection of the President's recommendation, we go in precisely the wrong direction. We freeze the pay of Federal judges and the top tier of the Government's professional and managerial class at submarket levels. We lock in an honorarium system that bears the potential for grievous abuse. And we ensure that the next pay raise Congress approves for the Nation's top officials—if such a raise is ever approved—will be passed through the back door, rather than in the light of day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order previously entered, the hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the clerk will read the joint resolution for the third time.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 129) disapproving the increases in executive, legislative, and judicial salaries recommended by the President under section 225 of the Federal Salary Act of 1967.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The question is on passage of House Joint Resolution 129. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 94, nays 6, as follows:

MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business for not to exceed 2 hours, with Senators permitted to speak therein for up to 5 minutes each.

NOMINATION OF JOHN TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, there have been a number of items in the paper concerning the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. Several recent reports indicate that defense magazines, Defense News, for example, and Army Times, have editorialized against the nomination of John Tower. I will ask unanimous consent that an article prepared by Benjamin Schemmer, editor of Armed Forces Journal International, be printed in the RECORD.

I should point out that Mr. Schemmer, a West Point graduate and former senior Pentagon official, has edited the 125-year-old, independent Armed Forces Journal International for 21 years. He has also done something unusual. He has admitted his bias: John Tower was the chairman of the Journal's board of directors until he resigned on January 20. Mr. Schemmer makes that very clear. I think he presents a cogent case why John Tower is indeed qualified to be Secretary of Defense.

I ask unanimous consent that his article and the editorial endorsing John Tower be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS IT TOWER'S FORCE OF CHARACTER, NOT THE LACK OF IT, THAT WORRIES HIS DETRACTORS?

(By Benjamin F. Schemmer, Editor, Armed Forces Journal International)

While Mikhail Gorbachov's "peacekrieg" excites the west with promises of a moderate new defense policy, President George Bush's defense policy appears in limbo because his Secretary of Defense-designate still awaits muster by the U.S. Senate. Gorbachov makes headlines with a cascade of appealing new initiatives; John G. Tower makes news having his dignity shredded by a torrent of allegations that he lacks the moral fiber, impartiality, and managerial experience to defend America (and our allies) honestly and efficiently.

John Tower hasn't just been carefully "screened" for this appointment; he's been "sifted," as he noted wryly a few weeks ago. Tower is undergoing democracy's version of Chinese water torture, given the weeks of White House interrogatories, FBI background checks, and press scrutiny he underwent in November and December. Since Tower's nomination on December 16th, the Senate Armed Services Committee has been undertaking a microscopic postmortem of all those inquiries—a process that some now view as an autopsy rather than the independent check of fitness for office which the Senate is supposed to provide. But the process is taking so long and has been so punctuated with innuendo that some pundits have concluded that John Tower's crucible has become George Bush's albatross. But they haven't questioned the double standards behind some challenges to Tower's confirmation.

Some say Tower's effectiveness as Secretary of Defense will be diminished, at least initially, because of the prolonged public scrutiny he has undergone while waiting, first, to be nominated and, now, to be confirmed. Others suggest he will be crippled simply because so many questions have been raised about him, no matter they should prove unfounded.

Concerns like those have been voiced several times, for instance, by Representative Les Aspin, Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. It's a curious argument—as if what might now disqualify Tower from serving as Secretary of Defense is that he's been more thoroughly vetted for the post than any of the 16 Defense Secretaries who, should he be confirmed, will have served before him. Following that logic, one might as well suggest that George Prescott Bush should have refused the oath of office on January 20th because he had to campaign so long to win a vote of confidence from the American people.

Late last week, just when it seemed the Senate Armed Services Committee had about concluded its commendably painstaking and unprecedented investigation of Tower's fitness for office, a vote on his confirmation was delayed because of a new allegation challenging Tower's personal conduct. To their credit—but Tower's pain (and the President's)—Senators Sam Nunn and John Warner, the Committee's Chairman and ranking minority member, immediately made public news of the charge and asked the White House to have the FBI investigate it. Atop that, late last week two defense tabloids (Defense News and Army Times, owned by the same publisher) issued press releases flaking editorials from this week's editions that headlined, "Tower Should Step Aside." That made the CBS, NBC, and ABC evening news on Friday, even though neither contained any new information or new allegations: their thrust was "It is [Tower's] job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling."

That was the ultimate redundancy in double standards: two tabloids which depend for most of their income on advertising from defense firms (as does the magazine which I edit) challenged Tower's impartiality, while touting their own editorial independence and reportorial integrity, even though their pages are filled with news reports about hardware programs their advertisers are managing.

While John Tower's mettle continues to be tested by an overload of stray voltage, it is to President Bush's credit that he continues quietly to forge the comprehensive reassessment of American defense policies and Pentagon priorities which John Tower has promised. Indeed, as the latest spate of allegations made America's front pages and TV tubes last weekend, Tower was at the White House late Saturday afternoon working on the revised defense budget which the President will present to Congress late this week. One doubts that President Bush would have had Tower working on that agenda were he concerned that John G. Tower might not survive the latest round of character assassinations.

I've known John Tower well over a decade, and I've traveled with him to Europe to forums noted especially for their collegial, informal, after-hour discussions with our NATO allies—environments uniquely conducive to honest exchanges of differing views, but also replete with temptations to let one's hair down too much or to overindulge in the European grape. Until January 20th, Tower was the chairman of our board of directors, and my publisher and I have had occasion to enjoy Tower's company over lunch, over cocktails, at receptions, and during dinner. I have never seen John Tower "womanize;" I have never seen him under the influence of alcohol; I have never seen him embarrass himself, his committee, or his country. Indeed, his personal conduct has been a model of probity. Professionally, he is a hard-nosed but caring boss, a manager who minces no words yet gets things done with diplomacy and dispatch. He has never intruded on our editorial work, whether on behalf of his defense contractor clients or any other cause.

Indeed, I suspect that it is his force of character, not his lack of it, that worries some people about Tower's appointment as Secretary of Defense. To the discomfort of many senior military leaders, for instance, Tower has said repeatedly he plans to take a hard look at Service "roles and missions," a Pentagon sacred cow that most of his predecessors went out of their way never to challenge. He's also made clear that he plans to focus on "people" as a way of coping with constrained defense budgets; that translates to a challenge of military "force structure," another issue most members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff would prefer to avoid.

There is an old military saying, "Hardship builds character." Could it be that Tower's crucible may turn out to be the best testimony yet to George Bush's judgment of personal integrity and professional competence?

OUR BOSS QUIT; NOW HE NEEDS YOUR HELP

He quit; he's left us. A hard-nosed but caring boss, he could get more done with fewer words than any man we've ever known. But the President gave him a better offer, heading a team that will end amateur night in the Pentagon. Former Senator John G. Tower resigned as Chairman of AFJI's Board of Directors effective January 20th, and, as this issue went to press, he was midway through his Senate confirmation hearings to become America's 17th Secretary of Defense, the most thoroughly vetted one in America's history. John Tower wasn't just carefully "screened" for this appointment; as he's put it, he was "sifted." It's been a little rough on Tower, but he's a tough guy; and the unprecedented scrutiny he's undergone will, in the end, be good for America as well as our allies, imposing special confidence from the outset as Tower undertakes his heavy responsibilities in these uniquely challenging times.

We forego the usual temptation to give an incoming Secretary of Defense our advice. John Tower doesn't need it. What he needs now is your help—honest input from real professionals on the pitfalls and potential ahead.—Benjamin F. Schemmer.

CONTINUING THE VOLUNTARY RESTRAINT AGREEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I am here to speak on another dimension of the steel industry. I have been making a series of statements on the Senate floor, hopeful that people around this building will be listening and perhaps be persuaded by what it is that I and Senator HEINZ and others have to say. My goal is to lay out a clear rationale for continuing the Voluntary Restraint Agreement Program, which is due to expire, in fact, this year. Tomorrow, I will introduce legislation to extend the voluntary restraint agreement enforcement authority.

Last Thursday, Mr. President, I discussed the state of the U.S. steel industry in some detail. Today I would like to talk about the steel industries around the rest of the world and what they are doing and how they are sustained.

Beginning in 1974, global excess capacity in steel has caused pervasive mercantilism by our trading partners. This has manifested itself in many ways, and chief among them are two particular forms of behavior:

First, foreign governments have poured billions and billions of dollars into the construction of new steel mills; and

Second, foreign governments have poured billions of dollars into existing mills in order to preserve employment.

Many nations have also acted to protect home markets while increasing exports by any means at their disposal. Until recently, for example, South Africa flatout banned steel imports. The European Community has maintained a system of voluntary restraints on imports since 1978 which has held import penetration below 13 percent. Most developing countries have policies like Brazil's Law of Similars which limit steel imports to products the country's industry cannot supply.

In Communist countries, the state obviously is the only purchaser of steel, and it only buys what is not available from its home industry. In Japan, import penetration has never exceeded 6 percent and has averaged 4 percent. Japanese steel manufacturers have allegedly used their distribution system and other means to keep imports down.

With home markets protected, the U.S. market has for years served as an irresistable magnet for dumped and subsidized imports from all sources. Indeed, import penetration in the United States increased from around 13 percent in 1975 to over 26 percent by 1984. With declining demand in the late 1970's and 1980's, these government policies led to a gross imbalance between supply and demand and to disaster for U.S. steel companies.

How is steel sold in the global market? Every way imaginable. If you can think of a subsidy, it has been used. Since 1965, there have been several hundred subsidies and dumping cases brought against foreign steel producers by the U.S. industry and many have resulted in affirmative findings of subsidization and dumping.

That is the pattern, Mr. President. Other countries subsidize, protect, and dump.

I refer my colleagues to a compendium of these cases in the appendix to a document entitled "A National Steel Policy for Steel" published by our country's six largest integrated producers, and ask unanimous consent that this document be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, some examples of state intervention are: Brazil, through its state-owned steel holding company, Siderbras, has poured $14 billion into new construction, expansion, and infrastructure improvements for its domestic industry between 1979 and 1986. Because these investments occurred during the downturn in steel consumption after 1974, the Brazilian Government sold its steel at dumped and subsidized discount prices.

Italy's state-owned steel industry's principal operating subsidiary has not made a profit in 19 years. They do not care. Between 1980 and 1985, the Italian Government provided $14 billion in subsidies for its steel sector, most of it to cover operating losses.

Indonesia, Turkey, and Spain are other examples—and the list goes on and on. What has the U.S. industry done during this time? They have been forced to downsize, to rationalize—the U.S. industry has reduced its capacity by 30 percent, laid off over 55 percent of the work force that we had only a few years ago, to wit, approximately 350,000 jobs and over 25 of our companies have gone through bankruptcy, including LPV and Wheeling-Pittsburgh.

Mr. President, in a perfect, free-market world, that is the way excess capacity is reduced. The problem is, no one else is dealing with overcapacity anywhere near the way our country has. If the Voluntary Restraint Agreement Program expires and comes to a halt, the U.S. steel industry will have to continue its down-sizing virtually alone. More jobs will be lost, more companies will be lost, more capacity will be lost, and national security quickly becomes a vital factor. And that is not fair or wise. It is not fair to the industry nor to its workers, who have labored long and hard to bring our companies back to profitability and competitiveness. And it would be unwise to risk losing such a critical part of our country's industrial base.

World steel trade and indeed, the world steel industry itself, has been shaped by the policies of national governments. There is still excess capacity and there is still work to be done to make the U.S. industry more competitive. Many experts believe as much as $3 to $4 billion a year by U.S. companies is needed in new investments. Without the VRA's, it will be very difficult to make or justify investments of that magnitude.

And without further modernization, the industry is in danger of repeating the painful contractions of 1982-86 the minute we begin another downturn.

We must extend the VRA Program—the economic condition of the industry remains fragile and its financial recovery has only begun. I am confident that my colleagues in both bodies of Congress will agree, and that we will enact the necessary legislation swiftly.

Mr. President, I conclude my remarks simply by saying that when the voluntary restraint agreement on steel is introduced tomorrow by Senator HEINZ and myself, I hope that my colleagues will understand that this is not a frivolous or protectionist measure. It is something which simply provides the chance for our industry to survive.

President Bush supports it. There will be many cosponsors to this.

We have much work to do. We will not be very able to do it in this country without a viable steel industry.

(Ms. MIKULSKI assumed the chair.)

THE PRESIDENT'S STEEL PROGRAM

Mr. HENIZ. Mr. President, as my distinguished colleague from West Virginia has pointed out, today is the second day that he and I have taken the floor to discuss the extension of the President's Steel Program.

As my colleagues will recall, last week I went into some detail, complete with charts, on the fundamentally distorted nature of the world steel market. I itemized the extent of subsidized steel production throughout the world. I provided a complete list of the many antidumping and countervailing duty cases that the domestic steel industry successfully pursued in the past.

My conclusion last week was that world trade in steel was a mess and that the primary, though hardly exclusive, victim was the United States, the most open developed market for steel.

The President's Steel Program was created to try to bring some order to the market in a way that would help the domestic industry, battered by unfairly traded imports, to regain its competitiveness. In that respect, the program has had a major impact.

Capacity in the industry has been reduced some 27 percent since 1982 without the billions of dollars in foreign government assistance that, for example, the European Community invested to do the same thing over a much longer period of time.

Product yields are up from 6 percent and energy efficiency is up a stunning 37 percent since 1982.

By 1987, the U.S. steel industry required somewhere between 8 to 14 percent fewer man-hours per ton—as you can see from this chart, the orange line—than any of the major producers.

After a long period of high costs, the U.S. industry is now competitive with all major producers. That is what this line really means. In fact, a leading steel analyst now estimates that American auto makers as paying about $100 per ton less for their domestic steel than Toyota, Kamatsu or any user is paying in Japan.

Employment costs are shown. Total costs averaged $23.71 per hour in 1987 compared to a record high of $26.29 in November, 1982.

And, as we well aware, employment is also down—more than 60 percent—and it has certainly hurt—from the 1975-79 average.

The President's program has also helped to limit unfairly traded imports. A recent study done by Putnam, Hayes and Bartlett estimates imports would have been 3 percentage points higher if there had been no VRA's, which translates into 8.4 million extra tons shipped and 7,000 jobs saved.

As illustrated in these charts, the orange, the taller part, is the level of imports without the voluntary steel restraints. As my colleagues can see, domestic shipments would have been much lower without the VRA's in the orange and, again, industry employment would have been significantly lower. It has lowered a lot, within the blue, without the VRA's.

This hardly offsets the losses suffered and the terrible human cost that has ensued, but it has clearly led to a more compact, more competitive industry. The study goes on to say:

> In fact, the actual effect is likely to have been even greater. The existence of five-year VRAs itself probably contributed to foreign capacity reductions, thereby increasing capacity utilization and further decreasing imports' share.

This is a particularly significant statement, Madam President, to those of us who have long argued that more frequent demonstrations of the United States will to act aggressively against unfair practices will result in behavior changes overseas. This is a case in point. By being firm, we have helped convince other nations of both the folly of their own market-distorting practices and of our new determination that we will not let them get away with it.

Of equal importance for the future of the program is the fact that it has not had a significant effect on prices. Prices dropped the first 2 years of the program and only began to rise in 1987, for reasons unrelated to the VRA's. By the end of the third quarter of 1988, prices averaged only 4 percent more than when the VRA Program began and were only 2.5 percent higher than in 1981. By contrast, the price of food went up 32.9 percent in the same period.

Trends in import prices have been the same, and they are now higher than U.S. prices. Import prices even went down while the dollar was declining and have only recently begun to rise—far less than the increase that would be required to maintain home country revenues.

This issue of pricing has been a particular sore point for me, Madam President, because of the numerous wild and frankly irresponsible assertions that have been flying around about how much this program costs steel users and consumers.

This program has been in existence for somewhat more than 4 years. For 2 of those years prices fell; for 2 of them prices rose—same program. Elementary logic would suggest that there are other factors in the marketplace beside this program determining the price of steel.

The main factor is obvious—increased demand. Demand for steel is up all over the world, and prices—again, all over the world—have responded accordingly. Add to that the two Congressional Research Service analyses that conclude the VRA Program was not responsible for price increases because actual imports were less than permitted by the VRA's, and one begins to see that the VRA's are not the real issue for steel users; rather it is the interaction of demand and supply in the marketplace.

Equally specious are the various numbers alleged to be the cost of this program to consumers. The one that has achieved the most currency is $7 billion per year, a figure that has been reported uncritically by a number of newspapers. When one realizes that the total value of all imported steel coming into this country in 1987 was $8.3 billion, it is clear how ridiculous the $7 billion figure is. It suggests that over 80 percent of the cost of all imported steel was due to the VRA Program, which makes no sense whatever.

John Jacobson and George Schink of AUS Consultants in Philadelphia have written a brief paper that very effectively demonstrates the nonsense of this figure. Mr. Jacobson and Mr. Schink point out that this figure stems from research that was done in 1984 before the VRA Program was created and was based on assumptions that simply turned out not to be true.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this paper be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT IS THE COST OF THE STEEL VRA PROGRAM?

(By John E. Jacobson, V.P. and Dr. George R. Schink, Chairman)

WHEN DOES $7 BILLION EQUAL $300 MILLION?

The Wall Street Journal editorial page of December 27, 1988 proves once again the squeaky wheel theory that he who trots out the most outrageous number gets the most attention. On that date, The Wall Street printed Mr. Gary Hufbauer's speech to the annual meeting of the American Institute for Imported Steel under the heading of "Wean the Steel Baron From Protection." In his speech, he claimed that the current steel Voluntary Restraint Arrangements (VRAs) cost steel consumers $7 billion per year or $750,000 for every steelworker job saved by the program. Even in today's environment of megadeficits this is a huge number—but is it real? American Iron and Steel Institute (AISI) sponsored research suggests that the cost is closer to $0.3 billion.

SPECULATION NOT SUPPORTED BY THE FACTS

Mr. Hufbauer's $7 billion claim is taken from a book that he wrote in 1984 called "Trade Protection in the United States: 31 Case Studies." In this book, he analyzes a diverse group of industries including textiles, orange juice, automobiles, color television, mushrooms and ceramic tiles as well as steel. This book utilizes the same explanatory model and similar assumptions for each of these diverse industries. It is not altogether surprising then that Hufbauer's work fails to address the real world dynamics of the global steel industry. What is surprising is that Hufbauer would totally ignore what has occurred in steel trade and pricing since the 1984 inception of VRAs when he prepared his December 1988 speech. Shockingly, this $7 billion figure is based on his estimates of more than four years ago about what might happen under VRAs. Here is a comparison of Hufbauer's assumptions with what has actually taken place in the steel industry.

Assumption #1—VRA program will include $500 million in tariffs.

Reality #1—No VRA tariffs.

Assumption #2—In 1985, finished imports will decline to 18.5% of the U.S. market from a 1984 share of 25.7%.

Reality #2—In 1985, finished imports were 23.5% of the U.S. market and total imports were 25.2% of the U.S. market, down from 26.2% in 1984.

Assumption #3—Import prices increase by 30%. Domestic prices increase by 12%.

Reality #3—In 1985, import prices rose by 3% and domestic prices fell by 4%.

In real terms from 1984 to 1988, import prices rose by 4% while domestic prices fell by 7%.

THE STEEL PRODUCER REBUTTAL

The AISI has published findings of VRA impacts which differ enormously from Hufbauer's conclusions. The AISI study estimates that VRAs pushed up domestic steel prices by a mere 0.3% per year for a cost to consumers of $300 million.

The AISI report includes real world steel industry facts and figures, in stark contrast to the Hafbauer make-believe steel data, but still embodies key self-serving assumptions. Among the more questionable AISI claims are (1) that VRAs have had virtually no impact on steel import prices; (2) that there is no relationship between exchange rates and import prices; and (3) that import constraints may actually have an overall positive welfare effect on the economy by promoting more efficient consumption.

KEY FACTORS AFFECTING THE MARKET UNDER VRA

Neither analysis of the VRA program has taken full account of key factors which have affected the steel market. These include:

(1) Price Changes Under VRA: Coincidence or Causality?

Steel price changes since 1984 have been affected by the longest steel strike in history (USX vs. United Steelworkers from August 1986-February 1987), competition from alternate materials, the gyrating dollar, bankruptcy filings by more than 10% of the steel industry, foreign demand and supply shifts, and the shifting fortunes of steel's major customer groups, as well as by the institution of VRAs. One must evaluate the effect of the VRAs taking full account of these other major influences.

(2) How Binding Are the VRA Constraints?

Our analysis, and that of others including the Congressional Research Service, indicates that VRA quotas have rarely been totally filled for all products from all countries. In fact, the short supply mechanism which is the device to monitor supply pinches on steel consumers has been little used (aside from semifinished steel) during the VRA program. Evidence indicates that VRAs may actually institutionalize a nation's import share (e.g., the auto VRAs with Japan.)

(3) Sharp Domestic Price Rises: Are Steelmakers That Stupid?

Steel is a competitive business. Smart companies cannot afford to price their product in a manner that will damage their customers. The data indicate that domestic price growth has been held down to increase U.S. steel's competitiveness. As shown in the following table, U.S. steel price increases are modest versus steel price increases overseas and price increases for competing materials.

A MORE BALANCED APPROACH TO EVALUATING VRA IMPACTS

Analysis by AUS Consultants suggests that determining winners and losers from the steel VRA program is not as simple as it appears on the surface. In fact, the program has vastly different impacts depending upon the country, steel product category and period of time that one analyzes. Not all foreign steel producers lose and not all domestic steel producers win under VRAs. Steel producers in Japan and the EEC are now content with their U.S. market shares due to strong domestic markets and currency shifts. Newly industrializing countries such as Brazil, South Korea and Taiwan would like to see their market allocation increased to assist in their planned steel industry expansions. Many U.S. steel producers themselves, who must buy semifinished steel on the open market, have paid enormous penalties for lack of access to imported semifinished product.

Similarly, the costs of the VRAs to consumers has been highly variable. The 80% surge in U.S. spot steel plate prices from early 1987 to mid-1988 would have been ameliorated by greater availability of imported plate. In stark contrast, consumers of Oil Country Tubular Goods (OCTG) may have benefitted from VRAs by the desire of importers to maintain U.S. market share in spite of weak demand and pricing for this product.

The 20 bilateral VRA agreements currently in place are all scheduled to expire on September 31, 1989. Each agreement has the stated objective of providing the U.S. steel industry with time to modernize and allow steel trade to stabilize. Things have improved dramatically on both of these fronts. However, there remain tremendous challenges ahead for the U.S. and international industry. It is our hope that wildly exaggerated claims by self interested parties will not cloud the vision of policymakers in Washington who must resolve the delicate issue of national steel trade policy.

Mr. HEINZ. Madam President, those assumptions were wrong about the level of imports that would actually be reached, about the configuration of the program, and about both domestic and import prices of steel; yet the figure persists.

This baffles me. Modeling can be useful in leading us to conclusions about the future, but it is unconscionable to continue to use such models 5 years later when empirical data exists to refute their assumptions. This is not the first time this has happened, and it won't be the last. I hope the administration and Congress are intelligent enough to ignore this kind of propaganda and instead base their analyses on real facts, not imaginary ones.

In conclusion, I hope these real facts make clear that the VRA Program has been good for the industry, good for the economy, and, in addition, good for other producers. Tomorrow I will discuss what more needs to be done.

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION SEPARATION ACT AND A BILL TO PROVIDE RISK BASED DEPOSIT INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Mr. GRAHAM. Madam President, we are all painfully aware of the serious problems in our savings and loan industry. Those problems demand pragmatic and expeditious resolution.

There are two schools of thought about how to solve an escalating crisis and they are potentially conflicting:

One says we need to move quickly to cut the losses resulting from over 500 insolvent savings and loans.

The second says we need studied reforms in the system to make sure those insolvencies do not recur.

The announcement yesterday by President Bush, of the administration's proposal to strengthen the S&L industry will contribute to a resolution of those objectives by linking the rescue operation to structural change.

The President's proposal also provides a specific point of departure for public debate and congressional action.

For the same purposes, on January 31, 1989, I introduced two bills—one to separate the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation from the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the other to allow FSLIC to authorize a risk-based insurance system.

The first bill—"The Federal Savings and Loan Corporation Separation Act"—will establish a three-member board of trustees to manage the Insurance Program for federally insured savings and loans.

It will also separate the insurance side of the current Federal Home Loan Bank Board from the regulatory and promotion side of the Bank Board.

The financial soundness of the S&L Insurance Program is of paramount interest as this financial soundness underscores the Government's commitment to back individual deposits in federally insured S&L's.

The deficit in the FSLIC insurance fund is now estimated to be between $80 to $100 billion.

Congress cannot stand by as the situation continues to deteriorate. This legislation takes the first steps to restore the health to the system.

Last week the Senate Banking Committee heard testimony from the General Accounting Office which reflects these proposals.

The GAO recommends that we separate FSLIC from the Bank Board and that the FDIC and FSLIC should have the ability to adjust FSLIC insurance premiums. There is a growing consensus on this course of action to restore the system's soundness.

By setting up a separate administration for the insurance program we relieve the pressure on the Federal Home Loan Bank Board from its conflicting responsibilities. The FHLBB will continue to charter local thrift associations, promote the S&L industry and maintain a stable flow of funds for home financing.

The three-member insurance board—consisting of three Presidential appointees—will focus solely on the insurance and regulation of the insurance fund.

That concentrated effort to manage the Insurance Program efficiently and well will promote public confidence in the safety and soundness of our savings and loan system.

This is not a new idea—only an overdue one. In 1956, President Eisenhower proposed a similar reorganization of FSLIC. He believed that the system had matured to the point where separation of the banking and insurance functions would enhance its health and growth. His proposal was never implemented.

And even earlier—in 1945—the General Accounting Office recommended a division of functions, insurance being handled separately. Those recommendations had merit then and they deserve close attention from us today.

For too many years the building crisis in our savings and loan industry didn't make it on to the "A" list of urgent problems.

Procrastination compounded the problem. We don't have years to think it over anymore.

The separation of the insurance corporation from the Bank Board is a sensible beginning to restore the integrity of our savings and loan system.

Our banking industry is a reflection of our democratic and prosperous Nation. Every corner of it deserves our careful scrutiny and protection. The Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation Separation Act makes an important distinction in the key functions directing savings and loans.

Since we are dealing with a multifaced problem, we must act in several areas to improve our S&L system. Accordingly, the second bill I have introduced amends the National Housing Act to establish risk-based insurance premiums for savings and loans.

This bill would permit the FSLIC to establish variable premium schemes for deposit insurance. The amount of an institution's premium would depend on its overall rating under a rating system that the agency would establish by regulation.

The rating FSLIC would create would include, among other things, an institution's capital, assets, management, earnings, liquidity, activities and any other criteria the regulators determine to be necessary and appropriate.

Under no circumstances could an institution's premium exceed the maximum insurance premium established by law—that is: five twenty-fourths of 1 percent for regular premiums and one/eighth of 1 percent for special premiums.

Neither the rating of an institution nor the amount of its adjusted premium would be disclosable under the Freedom of Information Act. This is the same disclosure procedure followed by the banking industry.

This special assessment insurance is a timely idea now because it recognizes the well-capitalized and well-managed savings and loans and allows them to continue to grow.

The continued growth of the healthy S&L's attests to the soundness of the overall system and provides for their contribution to the FSLIC fund which will help keep some of the ailing but not terminal S&L's afloat.

Madam President, we are all of one mind in wanting to restore the integrity of our savings and loan system as quickly as possible.

This legislation—the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation Act and the bill to amend the National Housing Act—will start us on the road to that recovery and I urge my colleagues to support it.

Madam President, I respectfully ask unanimous consent that copies of the two bills, which were introduced on January 31, 1989, editorials from the Miami Herald and the Washington Post be printed in the RECORD as well as the GAO testimony before the Banking Committee, the text of the Eisenhower plan of 1956 and the chart of GAO audit reports from 1945 through 1949 recommending separation of FSLIC from the Bank Board.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S&Ls: A FINE MESS

Who pays? That's the ultimate question in the mess engulfing many of the nation's savings-and-loan institutions (S&Ls). If Uncle Sam must bail out all of the failing S&Ls—and there are far more of them than can be covered by the deposit-insurance fund—who pays?

The debate has just begun, but already two sets of distasteful options are emerging. Either bank depositors will pay, or the taxpayers will. And either the costs—$100 billion or more—will be assessed openly, or they'll be artfully concealed.

All this is doubly distasteful because fast-money boys who mismanaged or plundered many failed S&Ls are largely spared the costs of their misfeasance and malfeasance. Indeed, many who ought to be in prison are still plying their trade. And why not? Nothing has been done—nothing—to fix the basic problem: The S&Ls—especially the state-chartered ones in places such as California—were deregulated just enough to let them play fast and loose with other people's money, but not enough to make them face the market consequences.

These pillagers were guaranteed that no matter how irresponsible their conduct, Uncle Sam's Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp. would pick up the pieces when they went bust. If a car insurer in effect made no distinction between drunks and good drivers, it would go broke too.

How did this mess arise? One powerful lobby—the U.S. League of Savings Institutions—deserves much blame. For years it has had virtual veto power over S&L legislation. It wants the taxpayers to foot the bill, and it was quick to fire at the Bush Administration's trial balloon to let depositors pay.

Granted, there are problems with the plan to assess a fee of 25 cents per $100 of savings. For one thing, it would force the depositors of banks and credit unions to help save the S&Ls. Yet if bank and credit-union depositors were exempted, S&L depositors simply would shift their money.

Commendably, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board is suing three of the Big Eight accounting firms whose audits failed to detect insolvency in S&Ls that soon collapsed. But the penalties, if levied, will be only token compared with the S&Ls' deficit.

So the question recurs: Who pays? If it's not to be the savers whose deposits are insured, it'll be the taxpayers—including some who can't save because they have nothing left after they pay their bills. Is that what Congress wants? If not, then what's the answer? C'mon, Congress, who pays?

[From the Orlando Sentinal, Nov. 25, 1988]

CLEAN UP THE S&L MESS

George Bush's budget-cutting challenge will be made a lot tougher by the savings and loan crisis, but it's not a crisis that should wait long for solutions.

Its scope is frightening. Between $100 billion and $450 billion will be needed to cover the thrift institutions' losses to date. And losses at 500 bankrupt thrifts still open for business are rising between $500 million and $1 billion a month.

The federal government probably will have to pick up the tab for those losses.

It won't let savings accounts go unprotected just because the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp., which guarantees deposits through assessments on the thrifts is worse than broke.

The longer the government waits, though, the larger the debt.

Lay the blame for most of this at the feet of deregulation—and its guru, Ronald Reagan. He has kept hands off. As losses piled up these past few years, he even refused to approve the extra examiners needed to curb industry abuses.

Still, Congress deserves its share of condemnation. Many members who accepted contributions from the savings and loan industry helped block proposals to make the industry reform itself.

The full story of the crisis is complicated and dates back to the 1970s. It includes many instances of thrifts going bust through no fault of their own.

But the abuses were made possible when Congress removed limits on interest rates the thrifts can pay. It also allowed the thrifts to put 40 percent of their deposits into investments other than the traditional and often not-so-profitable, home mortgages.

That helped many sick thrifts, but it also was an open invitation to fast-buck operators. They bought small thrifts and jacked up interest rates to attract deposits. Depositors didn't care how badly the institutions were managed. They knew FSLIC guaranteed deposits up to $100,000.

In 18 months, one thrift increased deposits from $11 million to more than $700 million. Its inscrupulous owner and many like him shoveled out money to developer friends and others as if it were free.

Defaults on loans soon skyrocketed. So did savings and loan failures.

No doubt Mr. Bush will look for ways to keep the thrifts' losses out of the budget for at least a while longer. He has too many other demands on available resources and has foolishly vowed not to raise taxes.

But whatever he manages to do will be a thumb in the dike.

The losses should be paid off as quickly as possible, Ideally, all those bankrupt thrifts would be closed down within a couple of years to stanch the financial hemorrhage.

However long it takes, the feds should enforce capital requirements for owners of savings and loans. They're supposed to put up about $3 of their own money for every $100 of deposits. Some have put up even more, but the problem-thrifts fall below that figure, if indeed their owners have any personal financial commitment.

Tougher enforcement would restrict the errant thrifts' ability to make loans and cool their ardor for astronomical deposits.

This hairy crisis could help teach Mr. Bush anything he still doesn't know about differences between the theory and the fact of leading the nation.

THRIFTS: FINAL REAGAN DEREGULATION FIASCO

"The irony of this situation is that federal government policies have led to this debacle," said a report on the massive savings and loan fiasco that will cost taxpayers upwards of $100 billion.

The report has an irony of its own. It is the last one that comes from President Reagan's Council of Economic Advisors.

Not mentioned is the fact that deregulation of savings and loans was one of those early moves by the pirates who sailed into Washington with Cap'n Gipper eight years ago.

So its a final irony that these economic wizards who have been navigating Reagan into red ink for eight years continued to brush lightly over what is really wrong with the S&Ls. The council's big suggestion was that perhaps deposit insurance might be lowered from $100,000 to $40,000.

That was too much even for Reagan's treasury secretary, who instantly disagreed. The problem is not federal deposit insurance. The problem is deregulation, coupled with federal deposit insurance.

The real reason that a number of savings and loans got into trouble is that although they were deregulated, their deposits were still insured by good old Uncle Sucker.

And it is only conservative common sense that if the public, through government, is going to insure, then the public, as government, has to regulate.

Deregulating while keeping federal deposit insurance was an open invitation to folly and villainy. Both rapidly began to take place as inexperienced and sometimes corrupt thrift officials broadened out from home loans into all kinds of exotic "investments."

Imagine being invited to gamble with someone else's money, while being assured that it didn't matter to them if you lost it because they would always get it back. That is what happened in the savings and loan industry.

It is important to note that there are a number of prudent S&Ls that did not abuse their deregulation. They are still in business and thriving.

But there were also a lot of eagle-eyed folks in the business who did zero in on that opportunity. And gamble they did.

Some, in places like Texas, were caught by bad economies. Others in boom states like California and Florida were trapped by their own mismanagement or corruption.

The fruit of S&L deregulation-with-insurance was vividly illustrated in 1988, as regulators closed or merged 222 insolvent thrifts. That is about half of the 500 institutions listed on the insolvent list at the year's start.

The drama will continue this year as Congress, which is also very much at fault in this fiasco, begins investigating how the barn door should have been locked—now that the horses have long strayed from the farm.

"We'll be looking at everything from high-flying investments in windmill farms to the use of 'hot-money' to the ability of the regulatory agencies to make hard-nosed decisions in a timely fashion," said the new chairman of the House Banking Committee.

Yes. Yes. Good old Congress always ready to posture gravely in front of a disaster it helped to create.

But what is at stake here, in addition to the billions it is going to cost taxpayers to clean up this mess, is a deeper question of the survival of the savings and loan industry.

S&Ls should survive. And they should survive with the federal deposit insurance that helped make them the haven for small investors and individual homeowners that brought home ownership to the average American.

And that means some kind of stringent federal regulation for the savings and loan industry.

Ronald Reagan rides off into the sunset still believing all of his cliches and apparently still oblivious to the fiscal disasters that his less-idealistic followers have inflicted on the rest of us.

From the oil and timber barons who have been encouraged to plunder our public lands, to the piracy in our savings and loans, to the ripoffs by military contractors, to the leveraged, junk bond savaging of some of our most prudently managed corporations, the 80's have been a time of massive fiscal foolishness.

Perhaps the final irony of all is that this era of freebooters folly, most vividly illustrated in the plight of our S&Ls, still enjoys the misnomer of "conservative."

There was nothing conservative about the S&L deregulation. It was gambling against common sense. And guess what fellow taxpayers? You lost.

[From the Florida Times-Union, Jan. 15, 1989]

PUT AN END TO THE EXPENSIVE FIASCO IN THE THRIFT INDUSTRY

The horrible mess in the savings and loan industry has to be solved soon, and with a minimum of budgeting trickery.

It is generally agreed that the fiasco is a result of mistakes by the federal government compounded by bigger mistakes, and in some cases outright thievery, by some in the industry.

Congress bears a good share of the blame and one member in particular needs to explain the part he has played: House Speaker Jim Wright, D-Tex.

Wright's interventions and insistence that the burgeoning crisis was merely a short-term economic pinch apparently have helped delay the inevitable and drive up the cost of the crisis.

Savings and loans, or thrifts, have a unique status. They grew up in this century and helped to make reality of the American dream of home ownership, once restricted to those who could save the 25 percent down payment needed to buy a home and were able to make the substantial monthly payments.

By paying 3 percent on deposits and loaning them out at 6 percent to home buyers, thrifts helped many people become homeowners for the first time.

But in the 1970's, soaring interest rates left thrifts saddled with long-term, low-interest loans while paying huge rates on short-term borrowed money.

In 1980, Congress lifted interest caps on deposits. Yet in 1981, thrifts were paying depositors 11 percent while collecting 10 percent on loans.

That year, the thrifts were allowed to go to variable rate mortgages. The next year they were allowed to branch out into business loans and real estate.

Many think Congress erred greatly in its timing. At that point, 75 percent of the thrifts already were unprofitable.

High flyers got into some parts of the business, elbowing aside the conservative money managers of old days. High risk speculation by people who, in many cases, were investing other people's money in a way they never would have invested their own, made the situation worse.

Congress "helped" by raising deposit insurance from $40,000 to $100,000, giving the speculators even more room to wheel and deal.

During the 1980s, 80 percent of all thrift insolvencies involved "wrongdoing," the U.S. House Government Operations Committee found.

The administration was determined to deregulate, and bank examiners were part of the cutback. Those who were left, however, tried to keep the pressure on. Among those feeling pressure were Texas thrift owners, who were seeing real estate prices fall along with oil prices. Wright intervened personally on behalf of one Texan (who was subsequently indicted on fraud charges), Business Week magazine said.

Former Federal Home Loan Bank Board Chairman Edwin J. Gray blames the thrift mess on the ties between "the industry and Congress," the magazine said.

Congress voted a $10.8 billion bailout in 1987, but kept it "off-budget" to avoid budget balancing problems. The next bailout may involve the same strategy, The Wall Street Journal said, at an additional cost of billions of dollars.

In 1988, the roof fell in, with a record number of thrifts going belly up, and the taxpayers were stuck with at least $70 billion of the $100 billion tab.

In the meantime, the deposit insurance ran out and the healthy thrifts remaining are now being tapped to help keep the sick ones alive.

Where and when will this all end?

When Congress quits stalling, starts cutting the losses and begins concentrating on protecting depositors. The federal machinery also should be pressing for criminal convictions where indicated, seizing assets, including personal assets of the speculators, and doing whatever else can be done to recoup losses and punish those who brought about this plight.

Wright, who got $240,000 from the thrift industry for his 1986 election campaign, has been a highly visible figure throughout this sorry mess. Further explanation of his role is being sought by the House Ethics Committee.

Already voices are advocating a dismantling of the thrift industry, by letting thrifts convert to or merge with banks.

That may or may not be a wise step, but if taken it would be an ignoble end to an industry most people probably associate with the friendly little business run by Jimmy Stewart in the movie shown frequently at Christmas time, "It's a Wonderful Life."

Congress should base its actions carefully on advice of financial experts. But when it does decide on a course, Congress should act decisively and swiftly to close this expensive chapter in U.S. financial affairs.

[From the Washington Post, Feb. 2, 1989]

S&Ls AND THE SENATORS

Congress is unquestionably going to have to provide public money, and provide it quickly, to pay for the S&L disaster. What about the reforms to ensure that this epidemic of failure and fraud will not be repeated?

When the Senate Banking Committee opened its hearings this week, a difference of opinion emerged. Some senators want to link the cleanup money and the reforms tightly together. Without the urgent need for money driving the legislation, they suspect, very little reform will ever get enacted. But there are also some senators who want to split the two and handle them separately.

The hundreds of insolvent savings and loan institutions continue to run losses that, by most estimates, are in the range of $1 billion a month. Most of these losses will eventually have to be met by the taxpayer. The federal regulators need money urgently to shut down these insolvent S&Ls, pay off the depositors and stop the losses. If the money gets tangled up in complicated reform legislation, the argument goes, it won't be passed until next fall at best. By then the cost of the cleanup, already approaching $100 billion, would be $10 billion higher.

This argument comes mainly from the friends of the S&L industry, which is well aware that reform may—and should-lead to the abolition of a separate S&L industry altogether. The committee's new chairman, Sen. Donald W. Riegle, opened the hearings by asking, among other things, whether there is any longer a need for it. The answer to that one is: no, it's time to fold the surviving S&Ls into the banking system and require them to live under the same rules as banks. But the S&Ls are accustomed to their own regulatory regime, a much looser and more malleable one. The S&Ls' lobbyists are going to fight furiously to keep it.

The S&Ls are now using their own failures as a weapon in their own defense. The effects of their mismanagement, compounded by inept regulation over the years, is now costing the country so much, they shriek, that Congress can't stop to think about causes and remedies. It's just going to have to shovel out the money fast, according to them, and leave the debates over reform to another day.

That would be exactly the wrong way to go. Congress needs to move promptly on reform, and Sen. Riegle promises that the committee will take up no other legislation until this bill is reported. But particularly in view of the enormous sums of public money involved, it would be irresponsible to provide a nickel without first imposing fundamental changes on the system that permitted this fiasco.

RESOLVING THE SAVINGS AND LOAN CRISIS

(Summary of Statement by Charles A. Bowsher, Comptroller General of the United States)

In response to a recent request from the Honorable Donald W. Riegle, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs, GAO provided its views on how to resolve problems in the thrift industry.

In Summary: GAO recommended providing sufficient funding to resolve what has become at least an $85 billion problem in FSLIC, the insurance fund that insures thrift industry deposits. However, to be sure that this situation is not repeated, GAO recommended that the system be reformed as a condition for committing federal funds.

Changed Structure and Management of the Deposit Insurance System: Without changes to the structure and management of the deposit insurance system, the federal government faces potentially large losses in insuring deposits. This potential for loss is most evident in FSLIC. To protect the integrity of the deposit insurance system, FSLIC needs to be made independent of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. Healthy and unhealthy thrifts should be put into separate funds so that tougher deposit insurance rules can fairly and equitably be applied to healthy thrifts right away.

Provide Funding: If reforms are adopted, then a plan should be adopted by the Congress that makes funds available to meet the financing shortfall which we estimate at around $85 billion. This plan should (1) provide for budget authority sufficient to finance case resolutions over the next three years, (2) require a thrift industry capital contribution to create an adequate insurance fund reserve, (3) provide FSLIC with the flexibility to undertake short term liquidity borrowing to meet any deposit outflows that might occur, (4) assure adequate controls over spending to protect the taxpayers' interests, and (5) use an on-budget approach that fully discloses the funding and outlays that are involved.

Changed Approach to Resolving Problem Institutions: FSLIC's approach to resolving cases depends too heavily on assistance agreements that minimize FSLIC's need for cash but require subsidies for up to 10 years. FSLIC needs money to achieve more flexibility in its approach. Using personnel resources from other federal agencies, FSLIC should take control of all insolvent institutions over the next year thereby curtailing the ability of these institutions to adversely affect healthy thrifts. FSLIC should then seek to resolve cases at the lowest cost to the government while minimizing adverse competitive impacts on healthy thrifts.

MR. CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS OF THE COMMITTEE: We are pleased to appear today to discuss problems in the thrift industry. My testimony is based principally on a report we are preparing for the House Banking Committee. I will also discuss work we have begun on your request to examine aspects of transactions entered into by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB) in December 1988.

I hope we are finally reaching a point where a comprehensive approach can be taken to dealing with the issues associated with the insolvency of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC). We estimate that to fully pay for insurance losses and to put FSLIC back on a solid financial footing it will cost at least $85 billion more than FSLIC currently anticipates receiving in revenue over the next 10 years. Delay will only increase this cost. Delay will also—

Perpetuate the tendency of weakly capitalized and insolvent institutions to squander our nation's wealth on questionable economic endeavors at no significant risk to their owners,

Weaken our financial system because healthy depository institutions must match the high rates of interest on deposits paid by weak and insolvent thrifts,

Weaken the regulatory process by creating pressure for lower regulatory standards across the depository institutions industry, and Perpetuate the situation in which the actions FSLIC does take will likely be merger agreements that avoid short run cash needs rather than minimize the federal government's costs in resolving cases.

Without question, federal financing will be needed to resolve the thrift industry situation. However, if we want to be as certain as we can that a FSLIC situation is not repeated, we must be concerned as well with changing the structure of the deposit insurance system. It would be a mistake to commit federal funds without adopting key reforms.

The remaining parts of my testimony discuss structural reforms, funding requirements, and the need for changes in the way problem cases are resolved.

STRUCTURAL CHANGES

The 1980s have been a turbulent period for our nation's depository institutions. Changes in the financial landscape resulting from market developments and legislated deregulation have drastically altered the way that depository institutions operate. These changes have many positive aspects, but combined with changes in the economy and in a breakdown in the regulatory system they have also resulted in new risks and a rash of thrift failures.

In light of these developments, we need to look critically at how the deposit insurance system functions. Our current system provides many benefits to the public that should be preserved. However, the risks to the government inherent in insuring about $2.5 trillion in bank and thrift deposits can be very great. By far, the most serious insurance problems now are in the thrift industry.

To effectively manage deposit insurance risks it is necessary to (1) have sufficient funds to pay for losses, otherwise the credibility of the insurer taking appropriate action is damaged; (2) ensure that levels of capital in institutions are sufficient to absorb reasonably anticipated losses; and (3) have an effective system of oversight and supervision to quickly identify problems, remedy them if possible, and close institutions at the point of their insolvency.

To accomplish these goals two key issues involving FSLIC must be addressed. First, is the problem of FSLIC's lack of independence. Presently, FSLIC operates under the direction of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board which both promotes and regulates the industry. The industry itself is overseen and supervised by the Federal Home Loan District Banks, which, in turn, are owned by each District Bank's constituent institutions. In our view, the Federal Home Loan Bank System's rule as an industry promoter has been accorded more importance than FSLIC's risk management and insurance function.

The second issue is how to best reorganize thrift industry oversight and supervision. This will be exceedingly difficult as long as insolvent and thinly capitalized institutions are allowed to compete with healthy institutions. An equitable way must be found to isolate problem cases so that we can "turn the corner" toward more effective oversight, supervision and enforcement of more rigorous rules for the rest of the industry.

To deal with these two issues, we recommend the following:

FSLIC should be made independent of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and established with a separate board of directors and adequate supervisory capability over both state and federally chartered thrifts. An independent FSLIC should oversee two separate insurance funds—one fund for healthy thrift institutions ("good companies") and another fund for insolvent or thinly capitalized thrifts that would be severely curtailed in their ability to compete with the rest of the depository institutions industry.

More flexibility should be given to both FDIC and FSLIC to adjust premiums to reflect actual or reasonably anticipated losses.

More authority should be given to both FDIC and FSLIC to place stringent controls on improperly operated and undercapitalized institutions.

Greater consistency between banks and thrifts should be established in matters pertaining to powers and operations that materially affect the deposit insurers' exposure to risk.

Capital adequacy requirements should be strengthened, and the quality of supervision and oversight must be improved through an increase in the personnel and other resources of the deposit insurance funds.

These and more specific recommendations will be detailed in our final report to be issued later this month to the House Banking Committee. The reforms and funding arrangements we recommend should help accomplish the goal of developing an appropriate regulatory structure for depository institutions. FSLIC's financial problems have to be solved. The deposit insurance agencies need to have greater powers over the terms and conditions for insuring both federal and state chartered institutions. A higher degree of comparability is needed between banks and thrifts in matters that materially affect deposit insurance risk. After these reforms are enacted, it will be easier to consider what other changes need to be made to the federal regulatory structure.

For example, as part of the reform package, we recommend allowing qualified thrifts to choose between remaining in the reorganized FSLIC or switching to FDIC should help Congress in making future regulatory decisions. Business decisions made by individual healthy thrifts will provide useful information about the value of thirft charters and the need for a separately identified thrift industry.

FUNDING TO FULLY RESOLVE PROBLEMS MUST BE PROVIDED

Insolvent institutions cannot be effectively resolved unless enough money is available. Unfortunately, deciding precisely how much money will be needed and who should pay will be difficult.

As I indicated at the outset, our best judgment at this time is that it will cost FSLIC at least $85 billion more than it currently anticipates receiving over the next 10 years to deal with the problem. Of this amount, $26 billion represents FSLIC's unfunded cost of paying for actions taken in 1988 and $34 billion represents the future cost of acting on the approximately 350 remaining insolvent cases. In addition, $5 billion represents the cost of resolving cases not presently identified as problems, and $20 billion is needed to establish adequate reserves. However, given the fluid nature of the situation and the fact that we haven't analyzed all of the actions taken in 1988, I want to stress that these number are only estimates.

We believe the thrift industry should pay as much of the shortfall as possible. However, the industry is currently paying premium assessments that are more than two times higher than those paid by the banking industry. Many believe that indefinite continuation of the special assessment will weaken healthy thrifts and thereby prove self defeating.

Under the best of circumstances, it is not likely that the thrift industry can contribute much more to the funding shortfall. Although we think the healthy segment of the industry should be charged with recapitalizing the insurance arrangements that apply to them, the bulk of the money will have to be found elsewhere. Judgments as to who can pay how much must be made based on what is perceived to be fair. If contributions are not sought from other segments of the depository institutions industry, then the shortfall will have to be made by the federal government.

If the changes to risk management and case resolution approaches that I have described are made, then we recommend that a plan be adopted by Congress that makes available the funds needed to meet the shortfall. This plan should:

Provide for budget authority sufficient to finance case resolutions, which we believe can be completed over the next 3 years,

Assure adequate controls over spending to protect the taxpayers' interests, such as by creating a control board, and

Provide FSLIC with flexibility to undertake short-term liquidity borrowing to finance any deposit outflows that might occur while efforts are being made to determine resolution approaches for institutions placed in receivership.

To the extent that federal money is used, we recommend an on-budget approach that fully discloses the funding and outlays that are involved, even if this requires raising the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction targets. We also think that a restructured federal budget along the lines we have proposed elsewhere would better highlight the financing of FSLIC and similar enterprises that are set up to operate a business type cycle of operations.

A DIFFERENT APPROACH TO RESOLVING INSOLVENT INSTITUTIONS IS NEEDED

At the beginning of 1988 there are roughly 500 insolvent savings and loans with assets of about $140 billion. During 1988, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board began resolving these cases. The Bank Board acted on some 222 institutions, with most of the activity concentrated in the latter part of the year.

The willingness of the Bank Board to begin reducing its problem thrift caseload represents a much needed break from the practices of the past. But, we have serious reservations about the way the Bank Board proceeded.

In recent years the Federal government has been involved in several financial rescues. In 1984 we issued a report, based on the government's experience with Chrysler, New York City, and several other situations, about how such efforts should be structured.[1] This past experience underscores the importance of developing an adequate plan for financing, implementing, and overseeing these types of situations.

The Bank Board's actions have not been consistent with such an approach. The Bank Board has relied extensively on FSLIC assisted merger agreements that extend for up to 10 years. The notes and guarantees in these agreements provide a mechanism for coping with FSLIC's lack of funds and its lack of information on the financial condition of many of its insolvent institutions. Chart I summarizes the generic components of the deals.

As I noted earlier, at your request we are studying FSLIC's December 1988 transactions. We have not yet obtained all of the information we need and therefore are not in a position to comment in detail. However, we do have concerns about the nature of these agreements. These are summarized in Chart II.

Ownership capital contributed by private investors has been minimal, and large and thinly capitalized institutions are being created. If history is prologue, inadequate capital creates incentives for highly leveraged institutions to engage in unsafe and unsound management practices. These new institutions may, therefore, pose risks to FSLIC in the future. Should they become insolvent, FSLIC may find it even more difficult to fully resolve their situations because of their larger size.

The institutions resulting from the assisted mergers are heavily subsidized by FSLIC, and are competing with healthy nonassisted depository institutions at a cost advantage.

FSLIC provides capital loss indemnification and an operating subsidy on assets that appear to make it profitable to simply hold them. We therefore question the strength of the new institutions' incentives to actively manage and generate recoveries on those assets.

FSLIC faces a huge task in effectively administering these complex agreements.

Finally, it is questionable whether many of these mergers really save the government money compared to other options that would be possible if FSLIC had the money to resolve cases.

Another approach is needed that fully resolves insolvent institutions with no lingering adverse competitive effects on healthy

[1] Guidelines for Rescuing Large Failing Firms and Municipalities (GAO/GGD-84-34, dated March 29, 1984).

thrifts or threats to FSLIC's finances. We recommend that:

FSLIC promptly take control of all insolvent institutions. These institutions should be placed in receivership whenever necessary until a decision can be made to liquidate or merge them based on a careful assessment of their asset portfolios, and the comparative cost of each resolution option. Of fundamental importance, these institutions must be effectively isolated from the rest of the depository institutions industry to prevent them from competing with healthy institutions. Their operations must be limited to investing in high grade securities, managing bad assets on their books, and accepting deposits at prevailing market rates.

To accomplish this action, the assistance of state and federal regulators and insurance officials should be enlisted to quickly help assess the quality of assets in these institutions and make the necessary resolution decisions.

Arrangements should be made with FDIC for asset management and liquidation services until FSLIC can develop the requisite capability. FSLIC does not possess the infrastructure needed to manage the timely, cost effective resolution of all insolvent thrifts.

It is imperative that Congress reach an agreement about the FSLIC strategy as soon as possible. As things now stand, more of these merger agreements can be expected unless Congress acts to change FSLIC's strategy, reform the system, and provide the needed funds.

I recognize that within the outlines of the actions I have suggested, there are many specific arrangements that need to be worked out. We are prepared to provide whatever assistance this Committee and others deem necessary in developing the detailed plans for putting the thrift industry crisis behind us.

That concludes my prepared statement. My colleagues and I will be pleased to answer questions.

LOWER CAPITAL GAINS RATE WILL GAIN REVENUE

Mr. KASTEN. Madam President, President Bush's proposal to reduce the capital gains tax will—once again—spark the debate over capital gains and tax revenues. This debate is becoming as predictable as the annual return of the seasons. We have been through the same debate year in, year out—and some people continue to refuse to learn from American economic history. One year ago, 2 years ago, and even as far back as 1978, we have heard the very same argument against reducing the capital gains tax: That it would somehow lose precious tax revenues for the Federal Government.

Skeptics said about the 1978 capital gains tax cut that it would do little for investment and do much to erode tax revenues. I remember then-Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal asserting that the proposed capital gains rate reduction from 50 to 28 percent would cost the Treasury over $2 billion in revenue. He said, "The measure would do little for capital formation and would waste revenues."

Secretary Blumenthal objected. But in Congress, cooler economic heads prevailed—and the House and Senate agreed with my distinguished Wisconsin colleague, the late Congressman Bill Steiger, that it was time to cut the capital gains tax.

That was a cut in the tax on capital gains. Well, what happened? Did revenues go down? We've been through this time, and time, and time again—and you can go through the facts on this until everyone is blue in the face, but people just don't listen.

The fact is, taxes paid on capital gains increased from $9.1 billion in 1978 to $11.7 billion in 1979, and to $12.5 billion in 1980. In 1981, we cut the top rate on capital gains even further to 20 percent, and capital gains tax revenues rose to $12.7 billion in 1981, $12.9 billion in 1982, $18.5 billion in 1983, $21.5 billion in 1984 and $24.5 billion in 1985. Tax revenues to the Treasury were 184 percent higher in 1985 than in 1978.

These are all IRS figures. Nobody denies them. But a lot of people insist on ignoring them—and persist in making statements about revenues that are contrary to fact.

Mr. President, allow me to quote from last week's Washington Post editorial on capital gains. "* * * revenues would certainly drop. Taken all together, over a period of several years, the effect on revenues would be zero at best and possibly a substantial loss." Does this sound familiar? It should—it's the same old discredited nonsense we've been hearing year in, year out since 1978.

Mr. President, this blithe disregard for the facts—a disregard which is no doubt ideologically motivated—does nothing to expand public understanding of this issue. I would like to take this opportunity to explain to my colleagues once again why lower capital gains rates lead to higher tax revenues.

This revenue windfall will come from three sources. First, because the tax cost of selling equities will be cut in half, lower capital gains rates will lead to greater realizations by stockholders. These greater realizations will lead to permanently higher receipts from the capital gains tax.

As the historical record shows, capital gains taxes paid continued to climb several years after the tax rate cuts of 1978 and 1981. Many econometric studies of capital gains rates and revenues have quantified this potential realization effect. Harvard Prof. Lawrence Lindsey estimates that a flat 15-percent capital gains rate would increase capital gains taxes paid by $31 billion over 3 years.

Second, a lower capital gains tax rate increases the value of stocks. Taxing capital gains at a high rate reduces the potential return on investment—and this future return translates into a lower price for the stock today. Conversely, a lower capital gains rate will increase stock prices, giving the Government more gains to tax.

Third, and most important, a lower capital gains rate will raise GNP. Even the Congressional Budget Office admits that "lower rates on gains could increase savings and capital formation and channel more resources into venture capital." What CBO failed to recognize, however, is that this increased capital formations means that the entire tax base will grow even faster—resulting in an even greater increase in overall revenues to the Federal Government.

Most studies and available statistics on the revenue impact of the 1978 and 1981 tax cuts have focused solely on the realization effect and the subsequent increase in capital gains taxes paid. In doing so, they have neglected other important sources of revenue growth—and have, therefore, underestimated the potential revenue gains.

This week, President Bush will propose a cut in the capital gains tax as part of this fiscal 1990 budget plan. The administration will estimate that this proposal will have no revenue effect, or would raise revenue. The opponents of the proposal will once again charge that the tax rate cut will lose billions in tax revenue over the long run.

I am today calling upon the administration to clear the air—to tell the truth, the whole truth on this issue. The President's budget message must make it clear that revenues will rise as a result of this proposal. These revenues will result from increased realizations, and also from the increase in the value of current assets, and the increase in the rate of GNP growth. If Treasury cannot provide a complete, dynamic estimate now, they should promise that one will be furnished in the near future. More than anything else, the resolution of the revenue question will provide a major spark to the capital gains reform movement.

Mr. President, I believe that we can achieve a bipartisan consensus on capital gains this year—just as we did in 1978 and in 1981. Last week, I introduced a capital gains reform bill, S. 171, which would provide a capital gains tax cut for the sale of corporate stock. My bill would also partially index all capital assets for inflation.

In my discussions with administration officials, I have found all concerned to be receptive to my new approach on capital gains. In the 7th year of our recovery, when the odds of continued growth appear to be against us, it is more essential than ever that we do what we can to promote continued economic expansion.

That means we have to come up with a bipartisan, progrowth, projobs, capital gains reform bill. My bill is an olive branch to all sides of this debate—and a call to unity on the goals of American jobs, competitiveness and productivity.

Mr. President, now more than ever, we must focus on these economic goals. Because of the high capital gains rate, individuals have no incentive to assume the extra risk associated with investment in growth stocks.

As a result, entrepreneurs are finding it more difficult to secure investment funds from private sources. This shortage of startup capital today threatens to rob our economy of innovations, productivity gains, and job opportunities in the future.

Without startup capital, many of today's dynamic, young companies—such as Apple Computers, Federal Express, and Cray Research which is an important employer in my State of Wisconsin—never would have made it from the blackboard to the marketplace.

Other countries recognize the benefits of encouraging long-term investment—in fact, many do not tax capital gains at all. Their commitment to long-term investment has created new technologies and new innovations—and better products. We buy their products. They take our money. And U.S. jobs move overseas.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that a table comparing the taxation of capital gains in the United States with our European and Asian competitors be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Mr. KASTEN. Cutting the capital gains tax rate would keep jobs in my State of Wisconsin and in America. More importantly, it would create millions of new jobs for the future.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent that a new study by A.B. Laffer Associates on the negative impact of the high capital gains rate on small, high-growth stocks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the study was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INVESTMENT OBSERVATION: THE REVENGE OF THE LARGE CAP STOCKS

(By Victor A. Canto)

The January relation between stock market performance and capitalization (the January Effect) was reversed in 1989 (Table 1). The S&P 500 increased 7.1 percent while the small cap portfolio increased 6.99 percent.[1] Although only 11 basis points, the differential performance indicates that the stock of large capitalization companies outperformed the small capitalization stocks during the month of January for the first time since 1963.[2] Refining the small cap portfolio to exclude companies located in states with rising tax burdens would have improved the performance of the strategy. The group of stocks located in states with rising tax burdens appreciated only 6.17 percent. The remaining small cap stocks increased 7.11 percent, suggesting that the "state competitive environment" may enhance the small cap strategy.[3]

TABLE 1.—Small Capitalization and State Competitive Environment Stock Price Performance

	Percent
S&P 500	7.10
Small cap stocks	6.99
Small caps located in states with rising tax burdens	6.67
Small caps located in states not increasing tax burdens	7.11

Annually, since 1963, small cap stocks have outperformed large cap stocks and the market with the exception of two periods: During 1969–74, except for 1971, as well as during the Reagan years when the tax rate reductions were in place (1983–88). A common characteristic of these two periods is a change in differential taxation between ordinary income and capital gains income.

During the 1969–74 period, the maximum effective tax rate on capital gains was raised to approximately 50 percent from 25 percent. This increase in the tax rate was likely to be of great importance to many investors in small cap, non-dividend-paying stocks. Bracket creep increased the economy's overall marginal tax rates, resulting in a real stock market decline. The above-average increase in capital gains effective tax rates resulted in an underperformance by small cap stocks.

During the Reagan years, individual and corporate marginal tax rates were reduced substantially. The capital gains tax rate remained unchanged until the end of Reagan's second term when it was increased to 28 percent from 20 percent. The reduction in overall tax rates and unchanged capital gains tax rates favored larger capitalization stocks that rely less on capital gains and more on dividends. Not surprisingly, the reduction of tax rates resulted in an expanding overall market that benefited all stocks with the larger capitalization stocks benefiting disproportionately.

These two episodes suggest that small caps underperform when the differential tax rates on capital gains increase relative to tax rates on ordinary income. Whether the overall market and the small cap stocks will increase or decrease in absolute terms depends on the changes in the economy-wide marginal tax rate.[4]

President Bush's campaign pledges of no new taxes and to reduce the capital gains tax rate are favorable to the stock market in general and to the smaller capitalization stocks in particular. Yet, surprisingly, the small caps underperformed in January.

The stock market rally suggests that the market believes in the President's pledge of no tax rate increases and that his proposals will, in fact, lower the overall marginal tax rate for the economy. However, the underperformance of the small caps suggests that the new president will not be able to reduce the taxation of capital gains versus ordinary income. In fact, our interpretation of the small cap's relative performance suggests that the marginal tax rate on capital gains will increase.

While we believe President Bush intends to carry out his campaign promises, this will be partially offset by policy variables beyond his control. For example, personal income tax rates are indexed for inflation while the capital gains tax rate is not. Therefore, a rise in the inflation rate would increase the effective capital gain tax rate while leaving unchanged the remaining personal income tax rate.[5] Bracket creep on capital gains would have a disproportionate effect on small cap stocks, while the inflation impact on large capitalization stock would be substantially less pronounced. Therefore, bracket creep could result in an underperformance of the small cap stocks.

Analysts point out that gold prices are substantially lower than a year ago, the dollar is stronger, and inflation appears to be under control (Table 2). However, nonmonetary explanations are readily available that explain movement in gold prices and exchange rates. One of President Reagan's legacies is that peace is breaking out worldwide. If gold prices are indeed related to political uncertainty, the increase in world peace will clearly result in a reduction in gold prices.

The rise in the dollar may be partly explained by terms of trade effects.[6] Evidence in support of this view is the fact that interest rate differentials between the Swiss franc and the dollar are not much different today than on January 31, 1988 (Table 2).

Comparing stock market performance during January 1988 and 1989 provides additional supporting evidence. During January 1988, industries benefiting from a stronger dollar (non-traded sector industries) appreciated 5.9 percent while the industries benefiting from a weaker dollar (traded sector industries) advanced only 2.6 percent (Table 3). The relative performance of these industry groups was consistent with the then-appreciating dollar (Table 2).

TABLE 3.—SECTORAL PERFORMANCE IN TWO JANUARIES, 1988 AND 1989

[In percent]

	January 1988	January 1989
Dow Jones Industrial Average	1.0	8.0
S&P 500	4.0	7.1
Investor's daily	4.7	5.6
Falling interest rate	5.5	5.3
Rising interest rate	2.3	6.4
Non-traded/rising dollar	5.9	5.7
Traded/falling dollar	2.6	5.8
High-CATS	4.7	5.4
Low-CATS	3.6	6.2

During January 1988, the falling interest rate group outperformed the rising interest rate group 5.5 percent versus 2.3 percent. The relative performance of these industry groups was consistent with the then-declining interest rates. In short, the industries benefiting from a stronger dollar and low inflation, the High-CATS groups, outperformed the industries benefiting from a weaker dollar and higher inflation, Low-CATS groups 4.7 percent versus 3.6 percent. The overall relative performance of the various industry groups during 1988 was consistent with the behavior of the exchange rate and inflation rate.

Much like January 1988, during January 1989: Gold prices declined, 30-year Treasury bond yields declined, the dollar appreciated against the Swiss franc, and the differential between U.S. and Swiss long-term interest rates declined.

In spite of the similar behavior of these inflation indicators during the two Januaries, the relative performance of the different groups has been reversed during January 1989:

Large caps outperformed smaller capitalization stocks (Table 3);

Industry groups benefiting from rising interest rates outperformed stocks benefiting from falling interest rates 6.4 percent versus 5.3 percent;

Industries benefiting from a weaker dollar (traded sector industries) slightly outperformed industries benefiting from a stronger dollar (non-traded sector industries) 5.8 percent versus 5.7 percent;

Industry groups benefiting from high interest rates and a weaker dollar (Low-CATS) outperformed industries benefiting from low interest rates and a stronger dollar 6.2 percent versus 5.4 percent.

All this differential performance suggests that the sectoral performance is not in agreement with the interpretation that inflation is under control. Thus, one of two things must happen:

(1) If the consensus forecast that inflation is under control is correct, then the sector differential performance will reverse, and buying opportunities exist. Portfolio managers should buy industry groups currently underperforming the market (those which benefit from falling interest rates and a stronger dollar) and lengthen the duration of their bond portfolios;

(2) If the forecast implicit in the January 1989 sectoral performance is correct, inflation and interest rates will increase, and a defensive posture may be recommended. In this case, portfolio managers should buy industry groups which benefit from rising interest rates and a weaker dollar. Reduction of the duration of bond portfolios is in order.

In addition to the possible explanation for the decline in gold prices and appreciation of the dollar, there is additional disturbing information. Short-term interest rates have risen during January 1989. Both short- and long-term rates are higher now than they were a year ago. If the temporary increase in real rates brought about by tax reform is winding down, then it is hard to argue the higher nominal rate is due to an increase in U.S. real rates. This leaves inflation expectations as a possible explanation.

A final disturbing piece of information is the relation between excess base money and 30-year T-bonds (Figure 1). During January, the rate of growth of the base has increased relative to MI growth. If these trends persist, the historical relation is expected to hold true, and interest rates will increase.[7]

ALCOHOL RELATED INJURY AND MORTALITY

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to share with my colleagues a demonstration alcohol abuse prevention project in Rhode Island that has been effectively addressing one of our Nation's most serious challenges: How to prevent alcohol related injuries and fatalities, particularly those caused by drinking and driving.

The costs of alcohol abuse are clearly magnified on our roads and highways. When operators of cars, trucks or buses drink and drive, they endanger not only their own lives, but the lives of passengers entrusted to their care, other motorists and even innocent bystanders. Too often, we pick up the newspaper and read about the suffering caused by drunk drivers: The tremendous loss of human potential, the promising lives cut short, and the families torn apart by tragedy.

Drunk driving is responsible for the deaths of 23,000 people annually or one person every 22 minutes. Numbers alone, however—even numbers of this magnitude—do not begin to tell the story of the suffering and loss caused by drunk driving every day.

Unfortunately, alcohol abuse often begins in childhood. As early as the fourth grade, almost one-third of 9- and 10-year-olds say they experience peer pressure to drink beer, wine or liquor. The average age of first use of alcohol is about 12 years old. Ninety-two percent of high school seniors have used alcohol. Nearly 5 percent of high school seniors drink on a daily basis. In real figures, almost 7 million of America's teenagers use alcohol on a current basis.

Given these statistics, it is not surprising that alcohol related highway accidents are the No. 1 killer of young people. Each weekend, two out of five high school seniors is involved in heavy drinking. Too young to legally drink in bars, these teenagers often drive to and from parties. Many of them do not understand the potential consequences of drunk driving. They do not think their alcohol consumption could lead to their death or the death of an innocent bystander, until it is too late.

We must reach out to our children and prevent them from falling into the trap of alcohol abuse before they carry their addiction into adulthood and onto the roads. Many States, with Federal support, have initiated effective programs to lower the numbers of teenage and adult drunk drivers.

The alcohol abuse prevention project in Rhode Island includes a wide range of intervention services that involves communities, restaurant servers, and the police. Its success leads me to believe it would also reduce the number of tragic and unnecessary alcohol related injuries and fatalities in other States.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a detailed summary of the alcohol related injury prevention project in Rhode Island be inserted in the RECORD. I urge my colleagues and other States to take notice and see if this program in whole or in part may be effective for them in their efforts to save lives.

There being no objection, the summary ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A COMMUNITY BASED, ALCOHOL RELATED INJURY PREVENTION PROJECT—RHODE ISLAND

INTRODUCTION

The Rhode Island Community Alcohol Abuse Prevention Project began in October, 1984 under a Cooperative Agreement among the Centers for Disease Control, the National Institutes of Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, and the Rhode Island Department of Health. The project goal is to develop a mechanism for the surveillance, identification and prevention of alcohol-related injuries at the community level. The project has four main objectives: (1) the measurement of alcohol-related injuries; (2) mobilization of an intervention community; (3) prevention of alcohol-related injuries; and (4) evaluation of the results by comparison of annualized rates measuring outcome changes across time and communities. It is modeled after the Heart Health Projects, one of which is located in Pawtucket, Rhode Island and has been a valuable resource.[1]

Several Rhode Island communities were matched on a range of socio-demographic and alcohol problem indicators. All were geographically separate to present spillover of intervention effects. They were mid-sized (20,000 to 50,000) so the impact of a small budget could be measured. They were institutionally developed, with one or more hospitals, schools, police department, radio stations, and newspapers, sufficient to provide social machinery for the interventions. Three communities were selected for study inclusion planning for two "control" sites and one intervention site.

DATA COLLECTION

Support for project goals and access to data were elicited from community leaders in all three communities. Twelve data sets were developed, tested, refined and implemented for 1985 and 1986 in the three communities, before one community was selected as the "intervention" site. Surveillance data are collected by project staff on an ongoing basis for city residents from police arrest and "accident" records, hospital emergency department records and discharge summaries for four hospitals, death certificates and Medical Examiners' records, to document morbidity and mortality outcome changes. Cross-sectional data from alcohol and health surveys of high school students and adult community residents have been gathered at baseline (1985, 1986) to document knowledge, attitude and behavior changes. Two specific alcohol-related health problems—injuries due to motor vehicle crashes and assaults—are targeted for outcome changes because of their high degree of alcohol-relatedness and the involvement of non-drinking third parties in injury events.

In July of 1986, after baseline data collection was well-established, one of the three communities, Woonsocket, was randomly and publicly selected as the intervention site. Random selection was designed to obviate political and scientific bias, to demonstrate fairness, and to maintain the interest of all three sites.

Baseline data analysis suggests that improved reporting of alcohol involvement is needed for accurate and complete identification of alcohol-related problems. To this end, a subjective alcohol report form was introduced by the project into all three police departments. It is completed for all non-DWI arrests based on the arresting officer's assessment of the presence and extent of alcohol involvement. The use of this system has been found to double the proportion of non-DWI arrests reported as alcohol-related from 36% to 62%.

COMMUNITY INTERVENTIONS

An integrated systemic approach to reducing alcohol-related injuries and injury deaths was instituted in Woonsocket. The intervention effort began in January of 1987 and is ongoing. The injury prevention programs are based on the assumption that two community gatekeeper groups—the police and servers of alcoholic beverages—occupy the frontline of injury prevention. Project efforts are aimed at providing resources and enhancing skills to effect positive changes in the knowledge, attitudes, and practices of police officers and servers relative to their legal responsibility to intoxicated citizens/patrons and drunken drivers. Increased enforcement of DWI laws and other liquor laws by police and more responsible sales and service of alcoholic beverages by liquor licensees are expected to reduce the chances of excessive or inappropriate drinking in high risk situations and other high risk behavior of drinkers, which in turn will reduce alcohol-related injuries and deaths.

Four criteria for designing the prevention strategies were:

(1) Strategies focus on the use of alcohol in high risk situations and its abuse in the general population, not on special populations like alcoholics or high school students.

(2) The approach is environmental and structural in that it targets individuals' problem drinking indirectly through the decisions and actions of intermediaries—servers, the police, and social hosts who are in a position to intervene and may be serving as unwitting "enablers" of problem drinking.

(3) Intervention strategies are concurrent and mutually reinforcing rather than being unilateral.

(4) All strategies are consensually developed and acceptable to community opinion leaders to insure community cooperation and ownership.[2 3]

Based on the heart health models, a different name was selected to identify the intervention program as distinct from the umbrella study. The Woonsocket Mayor's Task Force on Alcohol and Drug Abuse participated in selecting the name—SAIVE—Stop Alcohol-Related Injury Through Voluntary Effort—and designing the logo, a red stop sing with SAIVE centered in white. Interventions include licensee and server programs and police enforcement and training programs, as well as cooperative programs with the Mayor's Task Force.

SERVER INTERVENTION

Elements for the server intervention program include: written responsible service policy adoption among owners (licensees); a 5-hour NHTSA-based training program for servers on dram shop liability laws and techniques for identifying intoxicated patrons and refusing service; certification upon completion of the training program; local newspaper and radio publicity on the server program; and city council workshops, featuring training for city councilors on criteria for enforcing local liquor ordinances by the R.I. Liquor Control Administrator. As of 15 April, 1988, 55% of servers employed in the 96 City of Woonsocket licensed establishments, including bars, restaurants, package stores, and private clubs, had been trained by project staff.

Trainers consist of a local alcohol treatment representative and a local server or licensee to provide credibility in both alcohol knowledge and in knowledge of server practices, culture and environments and to insure community ownership. Package store owners drafted a joint policy statement and continue to participate in a responsible sales training program designed to fit their needs.

Server training acceptability increased dramatically in the wake of a single vehicle crash in June of 1987 in which the 20-year-old male driver who had been served at a local bar was killed. A 7-day license suspension was instituted by the City Council, a fine was levied by the district court in a judgment against the owner of the tavern and the server, and a 2 million dollar civil law suit for third party liability has been filed by the mother of the deceased. This circumstance has vividly and unequivocably brought home the potential legal liability of servers and licensees when visibly intoxicated patrons or underaged patrons are served and proceed to injure a third party or to be killed or injured themselves if underaged. Figure 1 shows the increase in servers trained in relation to this incident and its legal aftermath.

POLICE INTERVENTION

Police enforcement and training programs have goals of increasing enforcement of DWI laws, especially at lower BACs (.10 to .15); increasing enforcement of local and state liquor laws; improving knowledge by police officers of dram shop laws and the role of alcohol in police work; and improving reporting of alcohol involvement in non-DWI arrests.

In the early stages of developing the police program, the Police Chief established a police planning group consisting of project staff, the commander of operations, the training officer, the prosecution officer and the night patrol commander. This group meets biweekly. Project-sponsored activities include radar patrols at selected intersections designated as high risk for speeding-related motor vehicle crashes; NHTSA-funded sobriety checkpoints or roadblocks for DWI enforcement; and selective enforcement of dram shop laws in local bars, restaurants and package stores by plain clothes detectives.

It was of critical importance to the success of this intervention effort that the server training program had been widely available and had achieved a high penetration rate before police selective enforcement programs in licensed establishments were initiated. It is important to lead out with a positive, educational approach rather than a regulatory approach in order to develop trust and goodwill in the community. Police patrols, while unpopular with licensees, are necessary to reinforce and support project efforts to increase responsible sales and service of alcohol.

The project provided needed equipment to the police to supplement their increased enforcement activities, including a second breath test machine, an intoxilyzer 5000, and a simulator; checkpoint cones and barrels; passive alcohol sensors as nonevidentiary field breath testers; and a video camrecorder for filming trainings, roadblocks, and patrols. Police training programs have included NHTSA-training in Improved Sobriety Testing (gaze nystagmus); training on the role of alcohol in police work; training on police liability in dealing with intoxicated citizens; training of one officer in on-scene "accident" investigation at Northwestern Traffic Institute, a first for the department; and training in the use of subjective alcohol report forms.

OTHER KEY INTERVENTIONS

A safe rides taxi program began over the holidays in 1987, with project funding for extended taxicab coverage until 2:30 a.m. Friday and Saturday nights. This strategy was inspired by the fact that seven local bars have a 2:00 a.m. closing time (1:00 a.m. is usual), but local taxi coverage previously ended at 1:30 a.m. on weekends. Publicity for the safe rides program included posters distributed to all licensees, pocket-sized calling cards featuring the cab company phone number, and newspaper and radio spots by the mayor and cab manager.

New initiatives for Year 04 of the project include: the presence of a trained alcoholism counselor in a hospital emergency department on weekends from 10-2 a.m. when alcohol-related incidents are most frequent; the use of a consortium approach through the Woonsocket Chamber of Commerce to implement employee assistance policy adoption in local companies; a public education campaign featuring the NHTSA Social Host Responsibility Training program; a safety belt campaign, including a seat belt policy for the city sponsored by the Mayor; technical assistance with the initial formation of a local association of liquor licensees; and the

Because alcohol involvement in injury is not a reportable condition and because alcohol abuse is potentially stigmatizing and legally problematic, data from existing hospital, police and death records under-report alcohol involvement in injury events. Efforts to increase case finding by improved reporting of alcohol are subject to complicated informed consent requirements for human subjects protection and consequent loss of respondents, biasing study results. As the link between alcohol and injury is more widely documented and as the toll that injuries take in premature mortality, morbidity and social and economic costs is better known, programs aimed at preventing alcohol-related injury should become more prevalent.

While the Rhode Island Community Alcohol Abuse Prevention Project is not yet completed, a number of important points transferable to other projects have been demonstrated. First, it is possible for a department of public health to broaden its view of injury prevention and collaborate effectively with police and alcohol servers. Second, significant momentum for social change can be gained, by engendering voluntary community commitment and action simply through the deployment of a single community organizer with the main goal of facilitating communication and liaison across groups.

These findings auger well for successful creation of community-based, public health-initiated injury prevention on a very modest budget. The ultimate impact of these efforts on injury mortality and morbidity rates remains to be demonstrated by the project in the final evaluation stage.

RESOLUTION OF DISAPPROVAL OF THE FEDERAL PAY RATE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I wanted to take a moment of the Senate's time—and I apologize for keeping the Presiding Officer and the staff waiting—to explain my vote on the resolution of disapproval of the pay increase.

I previously stated my feeling about the inadequacy of our current Quadrennial Commission compensation system because it has proven to be incapable of attracting the kind of people we need to fill very important jobs. I have placed those remarks in the RECORD and made a long statement on the Senate floor last week.

It probably would have been the better part of valor to just go along today and recognize the inevitability of that disapproval resolution passing both the House and Senate. I voted against it today because of the lack of consideration that the Congress has given to the Federal judiciary. In my judgment had the resolution of disapproval been delayed until midnight tonight the judiciary would have received its pay increase, and in many ways I probably was wrong in not bringing that result about.

It is a sad thing, I think, when Congress becomes so timid in terms of the review of Federal salaries that it effectively penalizes other portions of the Federal Government. I detailed in my previous statements the number of senior researcher and scientist positions that are unoccupied today, positions that we have tried to fill for months at the National Institutes of Health.

The issue facing NIH today is a matter of compensation. It reflects the competition of the private sector in filling similar jobs.

Mr. Culter, when he appeared before us as the Chairman of the Quadrennial Commission appointed by the President, pointed out to us that in many instances those senior biomedical research positions are filled indirectly because NIH makes grants to the nonprofit sector to acquire the expertise to perform that research. Those nonprofit corporations turn around and hire these senior research scientists and pay what they have to pay them to get their services. In the end, the taxpayer is paying not only salaries far in excess of what the President's recommendation which we have just turned down would have provided directly to these scientists, but they are paying overhead charges and administration charges on top of the salaries. If we would just directly authorize the payment of a competitive and comparable salary these researchers would be working for NIH directly. Now they are working for a plethora of nonprofit corporations which have contracted with NIH but are out there paying what the traffic must bear to acquire the services of these very talented people to perform research in cancer, in AIDS, and in the other dreaded diseases. Although the Senate must not forget that the Quadrennial Pay Commission did not propose these salary increases based upon comparability with the private sector. In fact, the Commission based its recommendations upon comparable salaries in the nonprofit sector of the economy, Mr. President. That is where the basis for those recommendations came from.

Mr. President, that is past, but there is one sector that must pay a disproportionate share of the refusal of Congress to agree to these recommendations. The judiciary does not have a "competitive salary" because there are no "private judges," but there are private attorneys, and we are seeing an exodus of qualified judges from the Federal courts.

I predict we are going to see even more of an exodus now; and what is worse, we are going to see the best and the brightest not seek to make a career of serving in the Federal judiciary.

It does not make any sense to me for us to turn down the recommendation for the increase for the Federal judiciary, a very limited portion of our Government, but a very necessary one.

The framers of our Constitution wisely said that those people are appointed for life. Once they take office, their compensation cannot be reduced by the Congress.

So the message is out, the message is out to the legal profession, and you must be a lawyer to get on the Federal bench. The message is out: If you are entering into your law practice with the idea that in the future you might like to serve on the Federal bench, put that hope off until you get wealthy, put that hope off until you do not have any family responsibilities, and put that idea off until your children are all through school. Do not plan on getting a salary comparable to that which you could earn as a practicing lawyer in the private sector while you are serving on the Federal bench, because Congress is unwilling to come to grips with its own salary. It is intimidated by demagogs, and we end up with no increase, so we cut everybody else.

It is one thing to do that with executive branch policy level people who are, as my antagonist Mr. Nader pointed out, all political appointees—almost, not totally. He lumps the judiciary in that group, and I think that is unconscionable. But it is also unconscionable for us not to provide the salary that will attract to the Federal bench the best and most qualified judges we can get, young and old.

The answer was given to us, well, you can wait until they reach their zenith, after they have made their name practicing law; then they can retire to the Federal bench. That, too, is unconscionable to me. The Federal judiciary ought to be, as I said, the best and the brightest.

I cast my vote today in protest of the actions taken by the Congress, in not deleting the judiciary from this travesty so far as the response to the Quadrennial Pay Commission is concerned.

Again, I believe that the easy way is to turn these recommendations down. The easy way is just to go with the flow and say you will side with these so-called public interest groups out there who are attacking the Quadrennial Commission. Every time one of these so-called public interest leaders speaks, I get a hundred letters. They are usually the same hundred letters and I will continue to follow my conscience.

In my judgment, the judiciary ought to have been separated out from the President's recommendations. We have to find a way now to deal with the pay of Federal judges, and I challenge those who have destroyed this Quadrennial Pay Commission approach, and it has been destroyed by the actions taken in the last quadrennial review and this one, to come up with a viable solution.

No one of any substance will serve on a Quadrennial Pay Commission again. I do not believe that any President will send his recommendation up to Congress again. There will have to be a new system created. I challenge the critics. In my judgment, the critics have the duty now, since they have criticized the Quadrennial Pay Commission approach, to come up with a solution that will meet the public interest and will get us the people we need to enter into the judiciary.

Federal judges are now leaving the judiciary because of pay, and they are leaving—that has been thoroughly documented—there is no reason for us to believe that we can find a way to attract new people to come to the Federal bench, if they see that those who already took a lifetime assignment are leaving because the pay is inadequate.

Mr. President, it is my hope that those of us who believe in finding a solution to the problem of the proper remuneration for Federal employees will find some way to challenge those who have destroyed the current system.

I intend to do that. I am serving notice on the critics and on the Senate that throughout this year, I am going to be offering a series of amendments that will place the burden on them to come forward and provide us with a solution. One of the amendments I am going to offer is an amendment to say that no one who runs a nonprofit organization which contracts with the Federal Government can be paid a rate of pay in excess of that established for the executive branch at level 2. That is one solution.

Second, Mr. President, I think we ought to find a way to restrict the salaries of the executives of nonprofit groups which perform research for our Government via Federal grants. If they are really, truly, nonprofit corporations, they should not be sitting out there administering Federal money that can be better administered directly by the National Institutes of Health.

I am going to find a way to limit the grants that go out to nonprofits which then pay people to do things that ought to be done directly by Federal employees.

Those are two goals of mine for this year, and I know I will have the attention of the Senate as I try to achieve them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a statement which I prepared for the debate by the Senate on this issue last week.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, the issue before the Senate today is the acceptance or rejection of a Resolution of Disapproval regarding the President's recommendations on salaries for senior executives in the three branches of the Federal Government. But the narrowly defined procedural issue of the disposition of the Resolution of Disapproval is not, by any definition, the heart of the matter.

On the contrary, the issue is much larger. In fact, I would argue that the decision which we will make today will have a greater impact on the long-term course of our government than almost any other single decision which we will make this Congress. For today, Mr. President, the Senate has a rare opportunity to reaffirm the value of public service in a democratic society. I urge my colleagues to carefully weigh the public policy issues which underlie the President's recommendation and urge that you not be swayed by the voices of political expediency.

Mr. President, there is an old adage which says that "America gets the quality of government that it pays for." In 1989, we face the very real possibility that the Senate will again refuse to agree to the President's proposed salary increases. If adopted by the Congress, the inevitable result of this decision will be that the salary levels of senior Federal officials will continue to fall even farther behind the actual cost of living faced by those individuals and their families. Since 1969, the cost of living, as measured by the Consumer Price Index for Wages, has risen by nearly 230% while the salary level set for Level II of the Executive Schedule has risen only 110% since 1975. In other words, the salary of a Level II executive has been cut in half since 1969, in terms of purchasing power.

A secondary result of this decision will be that in the next few years literally hundreds of middle and senior level Federal employees will "call it quits" without any prospect of a replacement coming forward to accept the open position. But that is not the full extent of the problem. For those individuals who remain in the senior levels of Federal service, the effects of inflation continue to rob them of the purchasing power which they enjoyed when they entered the government. When measured in constant, inflation adjusted dollars, the current salaries of senior executives are 30-35% below what those same salaries were in 1969. Based upon statistics provided by the Office of Management and Budget, the value in 1969 of the salary provided to Federal employees at Level II of the Executive Schedule has been eroded by inflation by a factor of nearly 35% when measured in 1988 dollars.

Mr. President, if it is not already, it must be made clear to America that we are facing a "brain drain" from Federal service of unprecedented magnitude, the consequences of which are truly frightening.

Numerous examples of the "brain drain" are included in the report of the Quadrennial Commission. For members of the Federal judiciary the problem is becoming especially accute. The Judicial Conference of the United States reports that in the fifteen years from 1958 to 1973, only six judges resigned from the Federal bench. However, in the fifteen years from 1974 to 1988, there have been 57 resignations. The Judicial Conference conducted exit interviews with 26 of the judges who resigned after 1978 and found that almost all of those 26 judges cited financial considerations as a principal factor in their decision to resign. Mr. President, what does it say about a government which pays its Federal District Court Judges less than the salary which is earned by a first year graduate of Harvard, Yale, Chicago, or Michigan Law Schools who enters private practice?

As another example of the extent of this problem, the Senate should be aware that one of the greatest problems facing career civil servants is the issue of pay compression. By law, pay for general schedule civil servants is limited to the level of compensation paid to Level Five of the Executive Schedule, which is now $75,500. At that rate of pay, all career civil servants in the grades of GS-17, step 6 and above are capped as to compensation. In the military, general officers above the rank of two stars are capped. What does that mean, Mr. President? It means that there is no hope of an increase in pay (one of the principal attributes of any job promotion) for any executive above GS-17, step 6 or any general officer in the military above two stars. At present, according to the Quad, Commission report, this pay cap affects 1044 individuals in the general schedule and, according to the Department of Defense, 158 general officers in the armed forces of the United States.

As a practical consequence of this pay cap the senior management ranks of the civilian and military sectors of our government are being thinned at an alarming rate. We are now losing the best minds and most able administrators in our government. A graphic example of this brain-drain is that since 1986, nearly one-quarter (twenty-four percent) of the winners of the Presidential Rank Award for Distinguished Executive Service have left the federal government, 80% of whom have accepted higher paying jobs in private business. As my colleagues know, the Presidential Rank Award is the highest award offered to senior executives for excellence in management.

But the problem is not the retention of current government managers alone. An equally striking problem faces senior managers who are given the responsibility of recruiting new talent for senior executive positions in the Federal government. The magnitude of this recruitment problem is best illustrated by recent public testimony offered to the Quad Commission. In his appearance before the President's Quadrennial Commission on November 10, 1988, Dr. Anthony Fauci, former head of the National Cancer Institute and now head of the National Institutes of Health, testified that, for ten years, NIH has not been able to recruit a single senior research scientist from the private or academic sectors to conduct clinical or basic biomedical research. Mr. President, by refusing to adequately compensate federal employees, we are slowly, but inevitably, strangling the most productive and innovative areas of the federal service. We are making a conscious decision to drive the best people from government. Our grandchildren will hold us accountable.

The question is often asked, "what is an adequate salary level for senior managers in the federal government in 1989?" Comparisons with the compensation structure of private enterprise are often difficult to make. However, the Hay Group, a major employee benefits/compensation management consulting company, has done a recent study of the average salary for both higher paid and lower paid private sector corporate executives. The average salary level for higher paid executives in 1988 was $594,200, which the average salary level for lower paid executives was $229,800.

Comparisons with the salary levels of executives working for non-profit organizations may be more valid. The Presidents of large, private universities earn, on average, $185,000; hospital administrators earn, on average, $160,000; Presidents of large, public universities earn, on average, $125,000; and city managers of cities with populations in excess of 500,000 earn, on average, $110,000.

Three additional comparisons are illustrative of the point that I have been making on the inadequacy of current levels of Federal compensation. I would like to turn to comparisons of the level of pay for the New York City School Chief, the Los Angeles Police Chief, and the Los Angeles School Chief. When comparing the growth of the level of compensation for each of these individuals since 1969 and the increase in the compensation paid to level II senior Federal executives over the same time period, the comparisons are striking.

In my view, Mr. President, the day-to-day responsibilities borne by senior Federal executives, Members of Congress, and Federal Judicial appointees are on a par, by anyone's definition, with the occupations which are listed on the previous charts. Yet, each of the professions illustrated on the preceding charts earns far in excess of any senior Federal executive, Member of Congress, or District Court Judge. This inequity must be corrected before we lose any additional senior executives from the Federal government. If the correction is not made, senior managers and Federal Judges will resign in ever growing numbers because the cost of living continues to rise and these individuals will decide that they must act to protect their families for the future. Increases in the cost of living continue while senior Federal salaries fail to keep pace. The average home price of a Washington, D.C., area residence and the tuition costs for both private and public universities has far outpaced the rise in the Consumer Price Index, which is itself far greater than the rise in the rate of compensation for Level II of the Executive Schedule.

In testimony before the Quadrennial Commission and the Committee on Governmental Affairs, opponents of the President's recommendation made much of the fact that the pay increases recommended for the three branches of the Federal government were far in excess of the average wage increases received by the typical American worker over the last few decades and that the President's proposed increases were completely unjustified when viewed in light of the wage increases which typical working men and women received for their labor in the fields and factories of America. These assertions intrigued me, Mr. President, and I asked the Congressional Research Service at the Library of Congress to review private sector pay gains for the last eighty years, back to the turn of the century. The result of the C.R.S. analysis is quite interesting. In fact, the assertions of the opponents are untrue. Using the study entitled "Manpower in Economic Growth: The American Record Since 1800", which was prepared last year by the Department of Commerce, Bureau of Economic Analysis, and the Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, the Congressional Research Service has found that between 1907 and 1987 the Consumer Price Index rose 1122%. During the same 80 year period, the average earnings for full-time employees in America's agriculture sector rose 5293%; the earnings for full-time employees in the manufacturing sector rose 4307%; the earnings for full-time employees in the service sector rose 4891%; and the earnings of full-time employees in the government (Federal, state and local) sector rose 3459%. Mr. President, during that 80 year period, Congressional pay rose 1093%. In other words, Federal Judicial, Executive and Congressional pay has dramatically fallen behind all other sectors of the American economy since 1907 and has not even kept pace with inflation.

These charts illustrate one essential truth: since 1907, while the Consumer Price Index has been rising by 1122%, and since 1969, while the Consumer Price Index has been advancing by over 200% . . . while the cost of providing a college education and purchasing a house in the Washington, D.C., metropolitan area have more than tripled . . . and while the average wages of all comparable private sector workers have risen to more than keep pace with inflation, the compensation of senior Federal employees has actually fallen some 30-35% behind 1969 pay levels when measured in constant dollars. With the value of compensation actually falling for senior Federal employees, no one should be surprised by the decisions of increasing numbers of senior executives and managers to leave the Federal government.

By driving the most productive and innovative minds from the senior levels of government, we are leaving Federal service open to only two groups of individuals: the independently wealthy millionaire and the ideologically driven person for whom a particular cause is the motivating reason behind entering Federal service. I submit that such candidates for senior Federal positions have the two types of backgrounds which should cause the American people the greatest amount of concern because they represent two of the most clearly antidemocratic motivations. On the other hand, we have been successful as a democracy for the last two centuries largely because we have developed a citizen legislature and a civil service where public service and service to mankind have been the chief motivator. Mr. President, leaving Federal court appointments, Congressional seats, and positions in Federal regulatory agencies exclusively to millionaires or self-described "public interest" advocates is not, in my view, in the best interests of our democracy.

For two hundred years as a nation, we have periodically addressed the issue of increasing the pay of Federal government employees. For two hundred years, Congress has wrestled with the issue of the adequacy of Federal salaries, including its own. For two hundred years we have attempted to develop a system by which Federal pay can be raised without creating an issue which can be demagogued by those who appear to believe that any Federal wage increase, no matter its size, is unjustified. Having listened to the well-orchestrated criticism which followed the President's recommendation earlier this month, I must reluctantly conclude that our efforts may again come to naught. Political expediency appears to have won the day. This realization and its implication for America's future leaves me greatly concerned, Mr. President.

Over the years, the issue of increasing Federal pay has been met with a negativism rarely found in any other issue which comes before the Congress. Because of the difficulty facing Congress over this issue, we agreed to the Federal Salary Act in 1967 which created the Quadrennial Commission to recommend changes in the Federal salary structure to the President and then to the Congress. In 1985, the way in which these recommendation became law was changed by Congress in order that it would be consistent with the decision of the United States Supreme Court in I.N.S. v. Chadha, 462 U.S. 919 (1983), respecting the use of a "one house veto" by Congress.

Unfortunately, since 1969, the Quadrennial Commission approach has met with little more success than if the decision on raising Federal pay had been directly undertaken by Congress, as it was prior to 1967. In the twenty years since the first Quadrennial Commission recommendation in 1969, requests for salary increases have been sent up to Congress every four years and, more often than not, have been met with more outrage than acceptance. The single most noticeable result of this hostility has been that, when measured in constant dollars, the pay of senior managers in the Federal government has fallen 35% below that of the level fixed for the same position in 1969. During the same twenty year period, the compensation levels for all private sector wage earners has slightly improved over inflation.

Between 1970 and the end of 1987, the cost of living, as measured by the Consumer Price Index, rose at a rate of 204.5%. During the same period, letter carriers at the USPS have seen wage increases of 239.4%, social security beneficiaries have seen their entitlements raise 232.1%, military personal have seen their pay increase by 212.7% (excluding fringe benefits), private sector white collar workers have received wage increases (through 1986) of 196.5%, private sector blue collar workers have received (through 1986) wage advances of 183.8%, and Federal retirees have had pension adjustments of 197.1%. On the other hand, since 1970, Mr. President, Federal civilian employees in the general schedule have received pay increases totaling 132.6% while Members of Congress have received pay adjustments totaling only 109.6%.

In 1968, when I began my Senate service, I knew full well what the salary and conditions of employment were. I knew that I would be required to put in eighty hour weeks and to fly half-way around the globe to meet with my constituents. But I undertook the job without reservation because I thought that I could contribute something to the welfare of our state and the nation. I made a committment to the people of Alaska in 1968 to enforce the promises made to the people of Alaska by the Federal government at the time of statehood. I told the people of Alaska that I would remain in the Senate for as long as it might take to fulfill all of those promises. Whether or not this pay increase becomes effective does not matter to me. I will remain here, the people of my state willing, to keep my pledge to Alaska, pay increase or not.

In closing let me say that I argue for the President's recommendation because it is supportable on the merits and because it is the right thing to do. My argument in favor of the recommendation looks to the future not to the past. I am very concened about the future of our government. The thought of a Congress, a Judiciary, or an Administration filled with either millionaires or ideological purists is very unsettling to me. But without reasonable and periodic pay increases, that is exactly the kind of Fedeal government which will face our grandchildren in the next century.

Two hundred years ago, Thomas Jefferson envisioned a Federal government made up of yeoman farmers and small businessmen, merchants and laborers, doctors, lawyers, and skilled mechanics, Jefferson felt that each would bring to his government the experiences of life beyond the confines of the federal city. Such breadth of experience would keep the Congress, the courts, and the executive branch in touch with the concerns and interests of the people.

Today, we face the prospect that the Federal civilian service envisioned by Jefferson and in place for the last two centuries is no longer a reality. We have come to a fork in the road, Mr. President. One road leads off to a government which provides inadequate compensation and relies on millionaires and ideologues who are motivated by self-interest to fill the ranks. The other road leads to a government which provides adequate and periodically adjusted compensation and which, as a result, can recruit throughout society for the best and the brightest among its citizens. Keeping Federal salaries artificially and unrealistically low in 1989 will lead, without doubt, down the first road, Mr. President. Choosing that road is a mistake of the highest order and history will forever recall our short-sightedness.

SANDOL STODDARD ADDRESSES THE CHALLENGES FACING AMERICAN HOSPICES

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, one of the enduring challenges confronting our health care system is to help care for the dying.

In recent years, Americans from all walks of life have joined in an extraordinary effort to meet the physical, emotional and spiritual needs of the terminally ill through the creation of hospices. Much of the initiative for the hospice movement has been at the grassroots. These are community endeavors which have served to comfort the ill while forging new bonds between health care professionals and local religious leaders. In their spontaneity, in their creativity, in their deep community roots, we have seen the very best of the American character.

One of the very first hospices begun in the United States is Hospice of Marin, established in my home State in 1976 by community leaders, including Sandol Stoddard, author of "The Hospice Movement." Now, more than a decade later leaders of this, and other American hospices, are assessing the progress we have made and looking to the challenges ahead.

Many of these issues were addressed in the 10th annual meeting of the National Hospice Organization, held last November 18, 1988, in Orlando, FL. As Ms. Stoddard noted in the keynote address to this meeting, "hospice has a long history of stubborn, tough-minded struggle and triumph in the practical world." It is this noble history which will serve us all well as American hospices mature and adopt to meet the many challenges ahead.

I commend Ms. Stoddard's excellent speech to my colleagues' attention and ask unanimous consent that the full text be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOSPICE: PAST, PRESENT, FUTURE

(By Sandol Stoddard)

Ten years ago at the first annual meeting of the NHO some of us realized for the first time, I think, how many "hospice people" there were in this country. There were a lot. And that was exciting. I don't remember many details of that conference—I hope you'll remember this one better, ten years from now—but I do recall being at a microphone at one point prophesying that we were going to find an unfortunate new word in the dictionary some day, because down the road it was going to be said that dying patients in the U.S.A. were now being "hospicized."

During most of the past decade, I have been in another part of the forest, but recently I have focussed again on hospice; I have visited many of you and interviewed others on the telephone: I've spent a great deal of time reading what you have published, talking with people in related fields—law, government, religion, education, science—and have taken time as well, just pondering about all that has been happening.

And as I prepared this report for you, it was with the conviction that hospice in general is in good shape in America today; but that at the same time, many of our front line hospice people and members of the public are quite concerned about this very issue: hospicizing. In other words, there is a feeling out there that a medically and socially responsible plan for the care of dying persons and their families may in fact be losing its intimately human and communal base, thus its ethical grounding; that a substandard semblance of the program may be packaged and delivered to the public, disguised as the real thing. I have also heard a good deal of concern over financing and reimbursement problems; and from virtually all of you, anxiety about the ability of hospices to cope with a potentially overwhelming epidemic of AIDS.

As I see it, this is a single cluster of related issues, all having to do with the survival of hospice as itself: a program of care that is both technically meticulous and deeply personal, requiring devotion to principle down to the smallest of details; a program that demands, above all, what the current best-seller calls "A Passion For Excellence."

And so I will address this issue today, as soon as we have done some necessary groundwork; and because hospice is not a place, or a structure but a process, depending for its life upon people, I will begin with you.

You—and your many colleagues who cannot be here today—are remarkable people: energetic, resourceful, intelligent. You work hard, and I see some fine hospice care being given—not everywhere, but in most places. When hospice workers function well as a team, pooling their skills and resources—caring for one another as well as for patient and family—there seems to be almost inevitably a sense of rightness about it, a kind of joy and fulfillment that is all too rarely found in the workplace today.

"Privilege" is a word I heard you use often. "It is such a privilege to do this work." Many of you have spoken of the changes—the transformations, really—that you have experienced in your own lives. A doctor in a small town in the West said it eloquently: "It is a life-changing experience for a physician to become involved. My patients can see now that I understand their pain, that I have something to offer them. I stay with them, and we talk things over. I feel loved now by my patients. It doesn't matter that some of the things I am doing now really amount to nursing. I feel like a whole person."

As for the hospice nurse, she is a New-Age, All-American Heroine, and I expect to see her in bronze on the village green some day. "Superior to others in self-actualization" she has been called, but I like even better the description given to me by a hospice administrator, new to the field. "Independent, opinionated and stubborn—a real management problem." I have a feeling that our hospice nurses don't intend to be "managed"—I think they expect to be treated as independent equals. Hospice theory allows—in fact, invites—them to take this role. Despite a nationwide shortage of R.N.'s at present, this may be one reason why we still find them working, often for modest salaries, in hospices. You may be interested to know that of approximately 25 teams I was able to visit or be in close touch with lately, the 3 having most difficulty keeping R.N.'s were all being run in a hierarchical/authoritarian style by managers trained in other fields.

Nurses, physicians, members of clergy, social workers, therapists, and volunteers of myriad skills whose presence is so essential to this movement: you have worked together over the years to make the hospice phenomenon a reality in American life today—which is why I am now working on a book to be called "The Hospice Phenomenon." You have taught theory by your visible example; you have challenged professionals in other disciplines; you begin to make yourselves heard in the medical schools; and with the enterprise known as the Wisconsin Pain Initiative, you are part of a global effort on the part of the World Health Organization to bring to an end to the scandal of unnecessary human pain. It is a splendid record and you can be enormously proud of it.

If there are stern challenges ahead of you today—and there are—I think you are the people who can meet those challenges, and be inventive enough, and stubborn and independent enough, and tender and caring enough to transform them into gifts and opportunities.

Incidentally, I have seen the word "hospicize" used quite recently in a document that seems to have merged from somewhere deep in the bowels of federal bureaucracy. Perhaps they need our help over there.

I would like to touch upon some important points in our history now. This is a part of our treasure, and we can draw strength from it. It begins long ago, with hospice as a place of welcome kept by medieval religious orders so that pilgrims and travellers could be—in the lovely old words—"cherished and refreshed." Many were ill, and in the monastery gardens were herbs for healing, and for relief from pain. Those who were dying received special care and honor, for they too were seen as pilgrims, closer than others to God.

After this, political and military upheavals banished hospice almost entirely from the scene for hundreds of years; science flourished, and the modern hospital appeared, built on a military model of efficiency that had been invented, originally, by Romans for the quick repair of their slaves. Today's hospice is in part a response to the fact that hospitality, as well as appropriate care for those who cannot be cured, has been conspicuously lacking in our acute-care medical facilities.

A few charitable institutions calling themselves hospices appeared in Britain at the turn of this century. A young nurse and social worker named Cicely Saunders worked in one of these during WW2, and saw dying patients, in a loving environment, being kept both comfortable and alert with sufficient doses of narcotics round-the-clock, instead of being forced to "earn their relief" by suffering. Then one day when visiting a patient dying alone in a busy, general hospital, she asked what she could do to help—what there was that he wanted. The patient replied, "I want what is in your mind and in your heart." As they talked further it became the mutual dream of the nurse and the patient, that some day Cicely would have a home for the care of others who were dying; and the young man left a small legacy to provide (as he put it) a window for her home.

Nineteen years of hard work lay ahead before that dream would be a reality. Nurse Saunders went back to school, earned a medical degree, did intensive research in pain and sympton control, learned the administrative moves, raised money, coped with architects and contractors, hired staff, and at last in 1967, was able to open the doors of St. Christopher's Hospice in London. Cicely, now Dame Saunders, O.B.E., with a string of honors after her name, has taught us more than any other living person what hospice is.

"A place of welcome"—"cherished and refreshed"—"special care and honor"—"A loving environment"; these are some of the keys to the meaning of the work. But pay attention also to other signposts: "nineteen years of hard work"—"earned a medical degree"—"did research"—and—"raised money." Hospice has a long history of stubborn, tough-minded struggle and triumph in the practical world. St. Christopher's was founded on a dream, but it was built over a long period of time, with bricks and mortar, sweat and prayer.

In this country, bricks have not been so large a part of it. Americans have devised as many different hospice styles as we have differing communities; and this is an exciting development. And it serves to remind us once more that hospice is not a structure, but a process. We have a few freestanding units, and a few physically separate units within hospitals. However, hospice in America functions typically as a program of care in the home, in liason with other, non-hospice agencies and inpatient facilities. "Non-hospice" is the point of difficulty here; it is a tremendous battle for you to bring true hospice care for your patients into these very different systems. Watching the hospice team at work in a community hospital a man with broken bones asked wistfully, "Do you have to be dying to get this kind of care?"—and it is certainly true that the program serves as a benign influence upon other institutions. However, this is a side issue, a secondary benefit. We need to be clear at all times that our purpose, our promise and our commitment, is to offer the best of hospice care to our patients very carefully, with great attention, one at a time. It takes a very strong centering, in one's own philosophy or faith to do this. Hospice is not a work for the timid, the hasty, or the unconvinced.

Constance Holden, writing for Science magazine in 1976 saw hospice care in Britain as a startling marriage between science and religion. Here in America we hear less said about the religious or spiritual base of the work. I think it is because Americans are used to being so desperately polite to one another about religion that we hardly dare mention it. However, let's be brave for the moment. I'll hazard the opinion that the Christian faith, together with Judaism and the Judeo-Christian ethic, is the most powerful motivating force in the American hospice movement. I found it fascinating, and I think you will too, that every front-line, hands-on hospice worker I have spoken with at any length recently has volunteered a statement of faith, or a direct reference to the spiritual dimension of the work.

A doctor said, for example, "Eight days after I want to the first hospice workshop it came over me that I am a Christian." Another said, "My orientation is Eastern, non-Christian, and I find that doing this work is like a meditation—it keeps me where I want to be—that is, I mean, close to God." A nurse said, "I'm not a church-goer, but being with the patients puts me in touch with other people's spirituality, and in that way, I find my own. You really can't do this work and not believe—something."

In keeping with the nature of our pluralistic society, hospice founders in the U.S. were people of strong faith and varied religious commitments. They should be remembered here today, and I need to do some correction at the same time of our recent history. I have seen a number of references in print to the supposed fact that hospice in North America was started by "lay persons" and/or persons "outside the Establishment". The implication has been that as non-professionals, presumably lacking an intellectual or political base, they muddled around for a while, until a proper wave of organizers came along to fix things. Nothing could be further from the truth. Of course hospice does represent a sort of revolution; and I realize that it is traditional for the second revolutionary wave to slaughter any leaders left over from the first; but if we can't be civil, let's at least be accurate. Founders of hospice in this country were highly respected professionals: they knew very well what they were doing, and they were willing to labor hard for it, and take great personal risks.

One brand new hospice administrator even told me a few weeks ago that the whole thing was started by women. Well—my goodness.

The facts are as follows. In the late 1960s the Dean of the Yale School of Nursing, Florence S. Wald set up the research into the needs of dying persons that led, in 1974, to the beginning of patient care by what is now Connecticut Hospice. Among members of the first Steering Committee were Dr. Ira Goldenberg, Professor of Medicine at Yale, the Rev. Ed Dobihal, and Dr. Morris Wessel, a pediatrician who was, incidentally, the first physician to set up rooming-in for newborns in a major hospital. In 1975 the first Canadian hospice was founded by Dr. Balfour Mount, professor of surgery at the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal. During the same year a hospice was founded at St. Luke's Hospital in New York City, by the Rev. Carleton Sweeter and staff. Then, in 1986 in California, Hospice of Marin came into being as a result of long planning and collaboration between William M. Lamers, Jr., M.D., a psychiatrist, and Fr. John Thornton, an Episcopal priest. And in 1978, the Georgetown University Pilot Project on Hospice Care and the Hospice of Northern Virginia were founded by Dr. Josefina Magno.

After this the field opened up rather rapidly, and we saw some fine, responsible organizations coming along and doing excellent work; but during the late 70s and early 80s there were also some well-meaning groups calling themselves hospices without having stopped to enlist or develop the necessary skills. Energy was wasted on various non-issues, such as the supposed necessity of legalizing heroin in this country for hospice use. Proto-hospices and pseudo-hospices popped up during this period like mushrooms after rain, and it was hard for the public to know which ones could be trusted. The Standards and Accreditation Committee of the NHO, together with state and federal agencies and the JCAH have since provided some very useful, though not consistently watertight specifications.

The formal difference between a professional and a volunteer is not the issue here; conceivably, this could amount to nothing more than a piece of paper. The point I am making has to do, rather, with skill and intention. The professional has made a double commitment: one inner, demanding discipline and training, and the other outer, involving personal responsibility and a promise of excellence to society. The original meaning of the word "professional" is, "one who professes a faith." In that sense, every volunteer who works for hospice is a professional. All are acting on the belief that human life is something to be cherished and honored to the very last; and this belief is one of the hallmarks of a civilized society. Hospice work serves this ethos, and thus merits reimbursement by the public; however, excellence in the field cannot be bought or sold or legislated, because hospice care is not mere technique; it is a gift and an offering of the best that we have, in our minds and in our hearts.

The professional point of view, as contrasted to that of the market place, is one of the chief treasures of our heritage. Many professionals at first volunteered their services to hospice, trusting that the community would respond with necessary funding once they had seen the value of the work; and the fact that such extensive public support has been won in a mere ten years suggests that this was a good bet. The motto of many an early hospice in this country was, "Do the right thing; money will follow." Has enough money followed? Well, we shall see. I think all the returns are not in yet. I am quite certain, however, that if we do not keep our side of the bargain, and continue to offer what we have promised, the support of the public will be withdrawn, both in terms of volunteer efforts and of funding.

The lesson of failed promises, where quality is concerned, has been painfully learned by giants of American industry in the past two decades. Many large corporations once considered invincible are now scrambling to reorganize on sounder principles, so as to survive. But it's one thing to make cars and planes that fall apart; it's another to fail—as we must not do—at matters involving bioethics, and the belief systems of a nation. Hospice has been so well received here because it represents what is best in the collective mind and heart of America today. Here, it has involved not only a regrouping within the medical profession, and a new call for compassion and cooperation among related disciplines, but a tremendous outpouring of positive energy by the public at large. Eleven years ago there were a handful of working teams in the U.S.; now depending on the count, 1,700 to 2,000. We need to ask, what is the meaning of this?

There are many partial answers, each worth a chapter; and I can only touch upon some of them briefly. There is the reason of demography: an older population in the 1980's; more people dying with medical problems capable of being well-managed in the home. There is the financial reason: high-tech hospitals are less and less financially hospitable now; however excellence in hospice care does not always allow economy; and hospice philosophy does not permit dollar gain at human cost. There is the medical reason, a response to the inappropriate treatment so often given to patients dying in the acute-care, high-tech setting. But even this does not explain the passionate, grass-roots quality of the movement, and the eagerness of so many Americans to participate.

I myself am convinced that "health care delivery" is not really what the hospice phenomenon is about, even if this phrase is understood in the broadest sense possible, as pertaining to public health, and involving the moral as well as the physical well-being of the populace. I have to confess, I always have trouble keeping a straight face when I come across the phrase "health care delivery". What I always see in my mind's eye is a little man in a white uniform rushing up to a door carrying a package labelled "Health Care." He puts the package down, he rings the doorbell and he runs like hell—because God forbid there should be any human contact involved in this transaction.

With DRG's impacting our C-B ratios; in a world in which hospice is described by the federal bureaucracy as an "industry" (HCFA document No. 03248) and the NHO as a "national trade organization" founded, presumably, to assist in the efficient "hospicizing" of our "terminals" I suppose I ought to be glad to have a nice looking package delivered to me—instead of doing what I do, which is to poke it with my foot, and study it very carefully in case there might be a bomb inside.

What is this robot-talk? What is this nonlanguage about non-persons?

Hospice is an intimate transaction between human beings in community. The nature of the process is revealed in the teams we build, the way those teams are organized, and the way we must treat one another as well as our patients, day by day, if the program is going to work. Hospice people need to be together in ways that are mutually trustful, nurturing and supportive. The conventional hierarchies of the military-industrial establishment function so as to separate people from one another, and control them by making them relatively powerless, anonymous and interchangeable. This is exactly what hospice cannot do and survive.

And curiously enough, some of the most advanced and brilliantly successful technologies in the country today are beginning to discover that the old hierarchies were not working well for them either; and so that style of corporate management is also changing, out on the industrial frontier. Listen to the values being promoted now within firms like Lockheed, IBM, Hewlett-Packard, Apple Computer, Nucor Steel: individual initiative; integrity, trust, more care for persons, less for devices; a sense of community; decentralization—"small is beautiful." The command now going out is: reduce administration and bureaucracy by 80%; cut out the mind-numbing paperwork, the "demeaning irritants"—sounds like insurance forms, doesn't it?—that's a quote from "A Passion for Excellence"—and give immediate, practical support and encouragement instead to a series of lean, stripped-down teams that can get the job done, and do it right. An executive from GE, Gerhard Neumann, says of one of their recent development projects in jet engineering: "it reminded me of the Flying Tigers in China . . . [during WW2] . . . undermanned, overworked, and successful!" I'll bet that sounds familiar to some of you.

What must be called a humanist movement of sorts within U.S. industry seems to have begun about ten years ago when some executives in the automobile business suddenly noticed that everyone else was driving Toyotas; and they checked, and found out that Japanese cars worked better than American cars, and were also cheaper; and that was pretty humiliating.

They could have asked the early hospice groups in this country how to get a job done right: we could have told them. But of course they didn't; instead, they went over to Japan at great expense and discovered that chief executives there were not sitting in their offices with the doors closed, or going on round-the-world cruises; instead they were down in the plant every day, listening respectfully to their workers, taking their suggestions, encouraging them to be creative, and helping them to create a sense of community within the firm. And they were also out in the field, paying close and humble attention to the needs of their customers. So now, American managers are scrambling to do the same, and some of our industries are picking up. Meantime, hospice is in danger of bogging down under the same outdated administrative superstructures which, for very questionable reasons, we have borrowed from industry. I wonder—will we all have to pick up in another ten years and learn hospice theory all over again in Japan? I certainly hope not.

Here is an example of what inappropriate business practices can do to hospice. A large, well-endowed, non-profit organization in the U.S. got off to a fine start with the enthusiastic support of the community. As time went on, a typically hierarchical, topheavy corporate structure was applied to it, with the help of a large board of local businessmen who knew nothing of hospice practice or theory. They hired an autocratic, non-hospice-trained chief executive; group morale sank to rock bottom; and today they need a revolving door for medical staff because they are quitting almost as fast as they can be hired. The joke among the nurses there now is that any day, they will finally have one administrator per patient. Nurses are unionizing; they don't like the way they are treated; and there is some question as well, evidently, about the treatment patients are receiving. Local press representatives, needless to say, are fascinated—and hovering. Meantime the chief executive, who draws a salary of $100,000 a year, is already looking for the next job up the ladder in the federal bureaucracy. This is hospice? That's what it says in the brochure. But you can't put the business stamp on hospice, and then pour money on it, and make it work. Several of our wealthiest hospices have already gone under because they didn't understand this. Hospice depends upon teamwork, upon relationships of trust, upon professional commitment.

By contrast, let me tell you about another visit I made recently. I had asked to meet the leader of a hospice associated with a first rate university medical center. When I arrived I was met by the whole team, including two staff physicians. They were all leaders. In the room where we gathered I saw a chart, but it was not the usual administrative diagram with all those little, insulated coffins going up and down the page; instead it was a very sensible personal contract. All team-members had gone on a weekend retreat together, and there they had made rules to govern their working relationship. The rules were as follows: we will be honest with one another, we will treat one another with compassion, we will be non-judgmental; we will be active listeners; we will be flexible; we will let go of our expectations of the outcome; we will offer self-disclosure, demonstrating trust; we will ask for what we need, and thus risk vulnerability.

Now, it may be that wars, corporate takeovers and things of that sort could not be well-managed on such a basis, but the world would be a much better place without wars and corporate takeovers—and in the meantime, the rest of us have got work to do. I was not at all surprised to find that this was a sophisticated, accomplished and fast-moving team; that their main worries had to do with improvement of conditions for their patients; that they had plans to raise money for a small inpatient unit of their own, attached to the hospital, so as to avoid placing them even for temporary care in other, less satisfactory quarters.

It was a joy to be with these people; they knew what they were doing. There were no frills, not a sign of a status symbol, and I didn't see a bureaucrat for miles. Hard information was shared amid a great deal of laughter and nonsense of the most serious sort. The esprit de corps was so fine that it felt, at times rather like a conspiracy. "How do you go about teaching the other physicians here what they need to know about pain and symptom control?" I asked. The answer, with a huge grin, was, "insidiously."

We had fun. This is great morale, and it doesn't just happen. I am glad to say that I found it in many other places, too, across the country; but never where the spirit was lacking, because that is always reflected in the system. Dame Saunders has often pointed out that staff support calls for community—something "rather more closely knit than an ordinary professional group of people enthusiastic about their job." And Dr. Bal Mount says, "the holistic orientation of hospice care forces the physician to adopt a more egalitarian role, [and] the administrator is called upon to respond to the demands of the whole team, rather than those of a hierarchy." This is good, basic, necessary hospice practise.

And I think one reason for the powerful response to hospice we have seen here is that the people of this country are sick and tired of dealing with insensitive, unresponsive hierarchies. They want to reclaim the power they have given away to uncaring systems and so-called experts in the past. You know the definition of an expert: it's someone from out of town. I guess that makes us all experts, here today. We'd better watch out.

It's not only the hospice nurse who is independent, opinionated and stubborn; I think we love that story so because many of us answer to the same description. In fact, wasn't that why and how this country was settled to begin with; and don't those words pretty well describe our own pioneer and immigrant forefathers? I seem to remember that the British found out, in 1776, and again in 1812 that we present serious management problems. A large part of the hospice impetus here, I think, has been the sheer cussedness of American character; we don't trust big business-style medicine. Show us what to do at home, and give us the help we need with it, and we'd much rather get together again, and take care of each other the way we did in frontier villages. A man dying of Lou Gehrig's disease out in the Northwest said to me, "I like this hospice—it's kind of a neighbor to neighbor thing." He had trouble speaking, but he was sitting upright, immaculately dressed, in his own home, and he was so proud.

Like the barn-raising or the quilting bee of pioneer days, hospice builds community while lending enormous strength to individuals. In a fine book on hospice architecture, Deborah Allen Carey writes: "Hospice is a reaction to the anonymity of mass culture. . . . concurrent with other movements to promote . . . common interests and community." I agree. We hate anonymity and today we battle it constantly: look at the credits at the end of every movie; they go on and on and on until everyone has been mentioned, down to the person in charge of walking the dog. This is bizarre, but it is also wonderful; I think it says something about new social health. The body of society as a whole is injured when we don't look at one another, don't care. The vast quilt being made in memory of AIDS patients is another cry of protest against loss of personhood; so, of course, is the Vietnam War Memorial. When we give infinitely patient, skilled and loving care to one dying patient, and then another, we are empowered by, and responding to, a passion that runs through today's society like an electric current; we are saying: each person matters—every single one.

Then, too, death is a constant presence in our lives today; the mystery and the reality of it are always beside us. We think daily of nuclear warfare. The suffering of our planet is brought into our homes by television: homelessness, hunger, pollution, plague, war. Personal growth does not come without pain, and I believe we are growing now, haltingly and with great difficulty, into a nation far more aware of our need for the basic values of humanity, community, intimacy. And this we must call spiritual growth. "The knowledge that he is to be hanged in the morning" Dr. Johnson said, "serves to concentrate a man's mind wonderfully." The hospice movement in America represents that sort of concentration—we are asking: what, after all, really matters. And the answer seems to be, very simply, love—and the willingness and the need to take care of each other.

And now, you see, we are learning to do just that, with hospice at the forefront. As conquerors of a wilderness, with enormous physical prowess, we have tended to neglect the spirit that leads us, men and women alike, to nurture one another, and cherish all that lives. But the power of the feminine, as a part of every human life, will not stay under; both consciously and unconsciously now it works bring us all to greater wholeness. Thus we find a hospice physician unashamed to take a nursing role, whole a hospice nurse freely expresses her own power and creativity.

"The hospice movement must grow up," I have heard, and read rather often recently. This is true. Groups and movements like this grow organically. They mature in time. It is a fine thing to be grownup—ins't it? Or do some of us feel just a touch of sadness because there is something—something in our own lives that was, perhaps, lost along the way.

A coordinator of volunteers in the Midwest said to me, "I am afraid that we must lose our spirit now—that wonderful spirit of innocence." A community relations director in the east coast, ten years in hospice work, said, "I know how to have a dream and make it happen—but maybe we have to stop dreaming now."

The question for hospice today, as it must be at some time for each individual is, "What does it mean, to be grown up?" So it may help us, while we are assembled here, to ask in hospice terms: Is it more grownup to be able to manage an organization efficiently and fill our Medicare forms correctly and lobby effectively for what we want in Washington—or is it more grownup to be able to look into the eyes of a person who is dying, and not be afraid, and stay with that person for as long as it takes, and never count the time?

So, what is grown up? But wait—this is not an either/or situation. We can have both. Let's not ask, which is better, men or women, left brain or right brain; given the challenges ahead of hospice today, we are going to need all the brains we have got.

No, of course we must never stop dreaming. I believe we haven't been dreaming enought lately. Every reality begins with a dream: read the first book of Genesis. There was nothing there at all, except a Spirit brooding over the dark waters—and, look what happened. Everything happened—and Eden, too.

And it was very beautiful in Eden for a while, and after a time Adam came along and started naming all the animals. And when he had named them, then he lined them all up and started counting them; and there were a lot. And that was exciting. And then, Adam was tempted. He thought to himself, "There's got to be money in this someplace" . . . "think I'll start a zoo."

And you won't find it in the Book, but here is what really happened. Adam went straight to Washington then, and he got the AnimalCare Waiver and the AnimalCare Benefit passed by the legislature; and then he got the franchise, because there wasn't a whole lot of competition in Washington in those days. Eve was just dreaming and playing all this time, back home in Eden getting to know the animals, loving and enjoying them. And it was wonderful in Eden then because the animals didn't die, they just grew older, and finer—and more beautiful—they just matured.

And then Adam came home and he said. "Come on, woman, it's time to get organized, we've got to start building fences and fortifying this place, because I've got the franchise now, and nobody else is going to get my animals."

You know the rest of the story. God was walking in the garden in the cool of the day, and he saw palisades and gun-towers going up, all over Eden and he said, "Adam, Adam—what have you done?"

And to think, all this time, we've been blaming our problems on Eve.

I guess this, too, may sound rather familiar to you. I wonder, what can be done about it? It's kind of tough, dealing with Original Sin. I mean, we always think that our own sins are original, but that doesn't usually turn out to be the case.

Obviously, people who work hard doing something useful for society deserve to make a living. The trouble comes in when people who don't understand or care about the work come along and use it as a tool for personal advancement. Competition is bound to follow, and one of the saddest things I have experienced in a long time is the sight of established hospices, both for-profit and non-profit, working to put new little hospices, as potential rivals, out of business. This is happening. Surely, one would have thought that there is enough pain and misery to go around. But there are some—particularly among the more heavily capitalized hospices—who are looking upon this work as a growth industry; this is called, nobody else is going to get my giraffes. And it means grafting the methods and the structures of corporate power-politics onto a system which has launched itself bravely, and boldly, and intelligently, by way of a very different social contract with the American people.

I don't believe it's going to work in the long run, for a number of reasons. For one, I don't think the American people are going to like it: this is their hospice movement, not ours. For another, there is an important human truth just now being probed by avant leaders of industry, and that is: As soon as management is removed from the product, or from the significant event, the organization starts dying. And the corollary to that, noted already by battered investors and consumers in this country, is that a dying organization makes shoddy products.

Hospice has no end product but itself, and the wellbeing of those it cares for; and I expect that people who do this work badly on a large scale are going to begin wondering soon why they didn't go into steel or computers, or maybe Japanese motorcycles, instead of into dying people. The word is out that some of our patients, in fact, are already being "hospicized". And by that of course I mean, dying under pseudo-hospice auspices with physical pain poorly or carelessly managed, social and emotional and spiritual pain barely addressed, subcontracted out by the hundreds to other facilities. Staff members of one ambitious organization commute between 35 to 40 nursing homes; clergy and medical staff at another are on the verge of moral and nervous exhaustion; a chaplain said to me in a voice that was numb: "the most important thing I have to remember in this job is never to develop personal relationships with the patients—I couldn't bear it." Three patients are dying there, per day. And I am sorry to be telling you these ugly things, but I think you need to hear them. A furious clergyman from a largely gay, urban parish said "this is one step away from government-sponsored euthanasia, and when AIDS really hits, it's going to be profitable warehousing and genocide." This was not just one person. I heard similar thoughts in the South and in New England, as well as on the West Coast. Meantime, some hospice administrators are wondering why they have so much trouble—and I quote—"marketing our program to those people."

We might say, along with Pogo, "We have met the enemy, and they is us." But I believe, and with good reason, I think, that the vast majority of you, and of all hospice people today, utterly reject such attitudes and such abuses.

The point here I think is not whether a hospice is technically for-profit or not. I've heard a lot of anger out there on the for-profit issue; but let's be sure to draw the line in the right place. There are modest, proprietary organizations whose owners offer beautiful hospice care. On the other hand, many of our finest organizations battle more or less constantly for their integrity within other publicly owned institutions: home health agencies, for example. I have seen rather large hospices of this kind doing a first rate job, with the right kind of spirit and teamwork and leadership. If the intent of the hospice is to make money anywhere down the line, then that I think is where the line must be drawn; because the purpose of hospice is to care for people.

Our shield and buckler in the situation I think is a clear sense of our identity. Who are we? What are we really trying to do? A look at our administrative charts will help here. Early hospice charts were generally round, with all care-givers relating directly to patient/family at the center. If you must have an oblong chart, you might like to turn the one you have got upside down, unless you have already done that—because patient and family, of course, belong at the top. Hospice exists to serve them. Next comes the interdisciplinary team: the front-line care-givers; and if there is money, by the way, they get it. At the bottom belong what may be called the enablers: the people who allow your team to care for more than a very few patients; some of these, one hopes may be volunteers: bookkeepers, fundraisers, people in charge of community education, someone to recruit volunteers and see that they are trained. Now we need a small, working board of responsible people who are thoroughly acquainted with hospice theory and practice—please, not a large board of prominent but uninformed civic leaders who invariably vote for the wrong thing.

Leadership for your team emerges rather naturally in such a setting. If you can find room at the very bottom of this chart for two or three executives with MBA's, plus an assistant for each one of them, plus secretaries and receptionists, I suggest you get a pair of scissors and cut your piece of paper down smaller.

Now this is your classic, historically and philosophically basic, muscular, down-to-earth hospice; and in different communities it will tend to respond and develop in different ways. If you are caring for too many patients to make such a simple plan as this seem practical, perhaps you are caring for too many patients.

If you haven't enough patients to keep things going, I think you need to ask, "keep what going?" In many cases I suspect you've got too much overhead; time to "downsize" as they say in industry. One of the problems a lot of you are having is that no one reimburses you for the time you have to spend on those obnoxious insurance forms. I'm beginning to think a CPA should be included on the interdisciplinary team from now on, prepared to do heroic resuscitation.

But please listen carefully to your language, in the meantime. If your team had a "patient care coordinator" last year and this year you have suddenly got a "patient services manager", watch out. You are turning into a gas station.

Small is beautiful, in hospice as in a number of other responsible occupations. In teams of more than a dozen or so, something seems to happen organically, so it's that much harder to maintain community, integrity, efficiency. Hospices caring for a great many patients may do better with several teams, loosely linked. And if that still doesn't do it, how about helping another, small hospice to start up nearby. Sharing is beautiful too. We tell that to the kids all the time, but maybe it's more convincing if we show them.

As to Medicare, I understand that there is a certain amount of creative bookkeeping going on, making the facts fit the case as it were, tempering the wind to the shorn lamb. That's understandable, but a pity, because it wastes your energy and you shouldn't have to do it.

Perhaps we ought to go back to Washington and try to explain a little better what hospice really is. There are good people there, and some who care a great deal about the spirit and essence of the work. NHO I'm told will be working on this, and in the meantime, wonderful things can be accomplished even from way out in the boondocks via intelligent networking; I know of one such group today, amounting almost to an entire task force of innovative thinkers working on the problem of hospice and AIDS: it includes attorneys, writers, members of clergy, legislators, leaders from gay and black communities, and several well-seasoned hospice people.

I am sure we would all agree that hospice as it is generally practiced today is a far finer program than the one described in Medicare—far richer, and far more seriously responsible, to patient and family. The comment I have heard again and again across the country is, "They've left out exactly the things that make hospice what it is." Yes, and that's why I think we need to have another look at the situation.

How about, for example, the bereavement counsellor in a small town in Montana, leading evening support groups, making a splendid teaching film, worrying about how to survive financially. The question: should I drop this work and try the Peace Corps instead? I really want to help people.

And, then there is the R.N. in a poverty pocket in Colorado who has to fire up a wood stove to heat water before she can bathe her patient; she does it, of course, because she is a hospice nurse. I don't see anything like that on the Medicare forms.

And then, the physician in Alabama who makes a dozen unpaid house calls because he is really giving spiritual support to patient and family; and the physician in New York who finds that the best thing he can do at the moment is to roll up his sleeves and heat a bowl of soup for the patient—and share it with him. Spiritual hunger is not something we can respond to by serving up canned clergymen p.r.n. Real life doesn't work that way. Spiritual sustenance has got to be part of the flow.

And then there was the wealthy, retired executive I met in Wisconsin with his toolbox under his arm; he told me of his joy in fixing things around the office, and doing front-line work with difficult patients. He was very proud that he had done a week's wash recently for the wife of a dying man so that she could get out on the tractor and plow the farm. It was a privilege for him, he said, to volunteer—but how about the many, many people who cannot afford that leisure? Good question.

Federal reimbursement specifications as they are now written are better than nothing for most hospices, I'm sure; on the other hand, they do rather consistently suggest and reward lower levels of care; and this is not good. I am afraid that they also actually encourage warehousing, because here, assembly line tactics will pay. Also, and here I am quoting a fine article on hospice ethics by Joanne Lynn, there is encouragement to provide home care primarily to those "whose care needs can be predicted to remain low . . . [that is,] families with . . . physical, emotional and financial resources." This is another invitation to the profiteer, as well as a built-in dollar incentive to neglect caring for those in greatest need in our population. Unfortunately, hospice in America is at present a white, straight, middle class phenomenon; and federal legislation, instead of putting the stamp of approval on that, needs to help us move in exactly the opposite direction. Finding the right relationship between hospice and government is bound to be a very delicate matter; a useful way of thinking about that may be to remember how long and hard we must work sometimes to find the "window of comfort" for a person in pain. Too much of a controlling agency there means a comatose patient; too little means that the agony starts again. I think we simply must pay close attention to the problem, and keep working for desirable readjustments.

We will learn a great deal more tomorrow from Randy Shilts about the AIDS situation; but before closing I would like to share some thoughts with you about hospice and AIDS. Front line people have told me, from one end of the country to the other, that you intend to care for people who have AIDS, to the best of your ability. It has been a moving experience for me to hear this from you, in so many different voices. There is fear, of course, but it seems focussed at present not upon the disease, but on the possibility that appropriate care for even one AIDS patient might put a modest hospice into bankruptcy; and the possibility that a larger epidemic may wipe us all out with sheer physical and emotional fatigue.

There are many ways of approaching the problem. My way begins as always with hospice philosophy, and with our first principles. I think we have to be humble enough in this situation to ask the patient yet again what is really needed—what the patient wants. Some of you are already doing this, I know, and I love you for it. On a similar basis I have been working recently, with the help of some wise advisors and people within AIDS support networks, on an idea I'd like to share with you today; and this idea, still in a formative stage, has gone out to some interested senators; and the text of my talk today, for this reason, will be going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

A PROPOSAL: HOW HOSPICE CAN HELP WITH AIDS

1. It is understood that affluent gay communities have already adopted proto-hospice styles (as in the "San Francisco Model") in caring for one another; and that next to be hard hit will be the poor, especially inner city minorities.

2. Whereas, hospice: Is a process, not a place; is largely a home care program in the U.S. today; creates community in the process of caring for patients and families; teaches social as well as medical skills; and is soundly based in U.S. religious and humanist ethics.

3. Therefore, although inpatient facilities are also needed, the main thrust now should be:

4. To identify leaders and networks of loyalty in inner city populations, beginning with church and synagogue,

To offer, with their support, demonstration projects in hospice home-care, run by small, experienced, qualified hospice teams (as in the Flying Tigers operation, WW2)

To have hospice teams serve as personal and teamwork models while doing one-on-one teaching of technique

To offer job rehabilitation and other credits to persons now on welfare for learning and helping with this work

Thus—aim to create autonomous hospice and proto-hospice units within this population.

5. The results to be hoped for are:

Patients being cared for within neighborhoods help create stronger community there,

Care givers learn marketable skills as well as new autonomy and sense of self-worth,

Personal and community growth emerge from tragedy.

6. Federal Funds Needed: Salaries for demonstration teams; job rehab and welfare benefits for participants; and modest expense for space and equipment not donated.

Three million dollars in federal funds have been provided recently for an inpatient unit in the Los Angeles area that will serve 25 AIDS patients. This is great, and very necessary; but think what another sum like that could do to launch a pilot program that could be socially as well as medically enabling within some of our most tragic and fractured, inner city populations. Three million dollars isn't much, as government expenditures go, but it could put a great number of Flying Tigers over the culture-barriers and into the crisis areas where they may be needed most.

I mean, of course, the Tigers who managed to escape from that high-priced zoo we were talking about.

This is only the beginning of an idea, and since a part of my job for you is to dream, and to hear and record and communicate your dreams, I invite you all to join in further brainstorming toward the best and the finest responses that hospice can make to AIDS.

So here we are, facing the unknown together—the part of life and this world where it always used to say on the ancient maps: Beyond This Place Be Dragons. I have faith in you, and I believe that many wonderful adventures lie ahead. Some small miracles have already happened in connection with the AIDS tragedy—there has already been some healing, in the minds and hearts of individuals and in communities. There are times, as you know, when it is our patients who heal us.

And so I want to give my last words today to a volunteer who can hold up a lamp for us all. Here are the words of a white, straight, upper middle class woman, herself a fine musician, and the wife of a gifted young attorney:

"I am working with gay and black AIDS patients now, and yes, it was frightening at first. But I was brought up in a home where there was not very much touching, or affection expressed. And I feel such permission now, to touch and to hold—because they need it so. And it is possible always, no matter how ill they are, to make deep connection, person to person, that is the greatest thing. And a kind of holiness comes over the simplest of acts, so that helping a person to eat, or even just doing up a button, seems so totally important. Time doesn't matter because nothing I do for these patients feels like a waste. And an energy begins and it comes through, a sort of current—I don't dare say where it comes from, though I think I know—but sometimes I feel at these moments that I am being given permission to fall in love with the whole world."

Shalom. Go with God.

Thank you.

COMMENDING BAILEY GUARD FOR HIS OUTSTANDING SERVICE TO THE SENATE

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, Bailey Guard became an employee of the Senate on November 27, 1956, during the Eisenhower administration. He became minority staff director of the Environment and Public Works Committee on January 1, 1966—long before I began my service on this fine committee in 1979. He has served this committee faithfully, persistently, and sincerely over the years, working with all Members in a very civil and steady manner. He has always been very kind and helpful to me. A very fine man in every way. During the early years, Bailey helped to craft the important public works legislation that resulted in the revitalization of this country's infrastructure, our bridges, and highways—the glue that keeps this country connected. Then Bailey became involved in the early efforts to produce environmental protection legislation, including the original Clean Air Act. Over the years, Bailey helped to shepherd many important bills through the rock shoals of committee and floor consideration.

I have enjoyed him so and learned much from Bailey's counsel. I most closely worked with him on issues relating to our public buildings. He was always a diligent watch guard of the General Services Administration. He faithfully tried to insure that the taxpayer's money was not to be wasted on inappropriate construction activities.

Bailey Guard will be sorely missed on this committee. I wish him well. He is a fine friend and a great gentleman. I thank him for his unfailing help to me.

TRIBUTE TO UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA HEAD FOOTBALL COACH JOE MORRISON

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, on February 5, the University of South Carolina and our entire State lost a great man, teacher, and coach with the death of Joe Morrison. Coach Morrison, who was a former running back and wide receiver for the New York Giants, had successful coaching careers at the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga, the University of New Mexico, and the University of South Carolina, where he led the Gamecocks to three bowl games and the highest national football ranking in the school's history.

Coach Morrison was born and raised in Ohio and attended the University of Cincinnati, where he excelled on the football field. He set many school records in passing, rushing, and scoring, and was twice named to the All-Missouri Valley Conference Team. His successful college football career made him a prime candidate for professional football, and after playing in the the 1959 College All-Star Game, the Senior Bowl, and the North-South All Star Game, he was drafted in the third round by the New York Giants.

His 14-year career with the Giants was one marked by fame and glory. Known as Old Dependable for his many clutch plays, Coach Morrison remains the all-time Giants leader in receptions and is fourth in team history in career touchdowns. He was named Most Valuable Player by the NFL Touchdown Club in 1972, and his name was enshrined in Giants' history when the team retired his number at the end of his career.

He was often described by his teammates as the "ultimate team player," and Giants owner Wellington Mara remarked that "he would do anything that was asked of him."

This spirit of sportsmanship, team spirit and cooperation carried over into Coach Morrison's coaching career. He received the admiration and respect of his team members and his fellow coaches, and all who knew him well are deeply saddened by his loss. His players knew he had three simple rules to live by: Be open, honest, and fair. "It's just about that doggone simple," Coach Morrison was fond of saying.

As head football coach at the University of South Carolina, Coach Morrison inspired his team to reach new heights in athletic achievement. Treating his players not as boys but as young men, Coach Morrison taught them that if they combined hard work, a winning spirit and team cooperation they could achieve great things both on and off the football field. Because of his success as a teacher and coach, in 1984 he was presented with the prestigious Walter Camp National Coach of the Year Award.

A man of many outstanding qualities, Coach Morrison was especially interested in helping others reach their full potential. He will be sorely missed and long remembered by the people of our State, especially those who had the privilege of knowing him while he was head coach at the University of South Carolina.

I extend my deepest sympathy to Coach Morrison's wife, Mrs. JeVena Morrison, his two sons, Rick and Jeff, his daughter, Shelly, and his mother, Jeannette Mort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following articles concerning Coach Morrison be printed in the RECORD.

HEART ATTACK KILLS USC'S MORRISON—51-YEAR-OLD COACH FELL ILL AT STADIUM

(By Teddy Heffner)

University of South Carolina football coach Joe Morrison died Sunday night after suffering a heart attack.

Morrison, 51, collapsed in a shower after playing racquetball at Williams-Brice Stadium. He was rushed to Providence Hospital.

He was alive but unconscious when he arrived at the hospital at 8:44 p.m. He was pronounced dead at 9:03, Providence spokeswoman Dawn Catalano said.

Morrison was playing racquetball with attorney Ed "Punky" Holler, assistant football coach Joe Lee Dunn and businessman Ken Wheat. Wheat and Holler are former USC players.

After they finished, Morrison had trouble breathing but was talking to Holler, Wheat and Dunn. Trainer Terry Lewis and Dr. Robert Peele were called to the stadium, and Morrison agreed to go to the hospital.

While the call was being made for an ambulance, Morrison tried to take a shower but collapsed. He was taken unconscious from the shower and transported to the emergency room at Providence. Cardiopulmonary resuscitation was started on Morrison by the EMS crew, Ms. Catalano said.

The crew put Morrison on a mechanical CPR machine called a "thumper."

Morrison also was given cardiac medication intravenously, and a tube was inserted in his lungs to help him breathe, Ms. Catalano said.

When he arrived at Providence, external and internal pacemakers were administered by a cardiology team.

"We play racquetball two times a week," a badly shaken Wheat said. "He never recovered. He kept sweating and turning white. He just never recovered."

Morrison's wife JeVena, "JV," was with him in the emergency room, as were several USC officials, including athletic director King Dixon.

"A great man has left . . . we've had to turn loose of him," Dixon said. "All of us are pretty much in a state of shock."

USC President Dr. James B. Holderman called Morrison "a remarkable man."

"He did as much if not more than anyone else in the history of Carolina football to put it on the map," Holderman said. "He brought it into national rankings.

"You always knew where you were with Joe. He was straightforward. His word was gold, you could count on him."

Matt McKernan, who played under Morrison for five seasons, said he was in a state of shock.

"All of a sudden, he's gone." McKernan said. "It will be difficult for the guys still there to adjust."

National signing day for incoming recruits is Wednesday. Dixon said the athletic department will continue the work Morrison started.

"Our football program, and the life at the university, does go on." Dixon said. "Our heart will be with JV and Joe's mom and JV's family and Joe's family, but Wednesday is a big day for us and we know Coach Morrison and JV would want us to continue to build.

"It is our job to honor the commitments that Coach Morrison has made . . . solidify the staff and our athletic program as never before. And we will."

Dixon said Morrison "will be sorely missed."

"Very few people know Joe Morrison," Dixon said. "Joe was one of the most dedicated workers and one of the most competitive athletes. . . . I always held him in high esteem."

Morrison had a history of heart problems and previously had been hospitalized for that condition.

He underwent a surgical procedure to open blockage in a coronary artery in March 1985.

On that occasion, he was admitted to Providence after complaining of chest discomfort. Doctors discovered the blockage and performed a procedure called balloon angioplasty.

The procedure involved the insertion of a balloon catheter into the affected vessel. The balloon is then inflated and deflated, an action that flattens accumulated plaque against the artery wall and restores the flow of blood through the artery.

Morrison was head coach at USC for six seasons and produced three of the school's best teams. His 1984 club had a 10-2 record—the Gamecocks' best.

His '84 team won its first nine games before losing to Navy. USC came back to beat Clemson 22-21 the next week and earned a berth in the Gator Bowl.

The Gamecocks went 8-4 in 1987 and '88. The eight victories equal the second-best season in school history.

In his six seasons, USC compiled a 39-8-2 record, but his years were not without their problems.

Morrison was the defendant in a highly publicized paternity suit before the start of the 1987 season.

The athletic department was rocked in March 1988 by the firing of Bob Marcum as athletic director when a school committee determined the department's drug program was mismanaged.

This past season, a Sports Illustrated story by former player Tommy Chaikin alleged steroid abuse at the school.

"It seems like everything was building up," former All-American wide receiver Sterling Sharpe said. "I just talked to him yesterday (Saturday). He was in good spirits . . . his usual self. But looking at what all was going on, seeing what he was going through . . ."

Morrison was born Aug. 21, 1937, and grew up in Lima, Ohio, where he lettered four years in football and three years in basketball and baseball at South Lima High School.

After graduating in 1955, he attended the University of Cincinnati on a football scholarship. Morrison set school records in scoring, passing and rushing while twice earning All-Missouri Valley Conference honors. He played in several post-season all-star games and after his senior season was a third-round draft pick by the New York Giants.

Morrison's nickname was "Old Dependable" during his 14-year career with the Giants. He was tapped Most Valuable Player by the NFL Touchdown Club and was a recipient of the Sportsman Award in 1972.

Morrison was team captain seven times, held numerous records and missed just eight games in 14 years. After his retirement in 1972, the Giants retired his No. 40 jersey.

Morrison's college coaching career was full with revamping poor football programs.

He started his coaching career at the University of Tennessee-Chattanooga in 1973. He turned the Moccasins into a small college powerhouse that dominated the Southern Conference.

In 1980, he went to the University of New Mexico, where, during his third year, he transformed the losing program into a 10-1 winning team. He came to USC on Dec. 5, 1982.

Morrison is survived by his wife, the former JeVena Armstrong, his mother, Jeannette Mort of Lima, Ohio; a sister, Ann Moeller, of Ann Arbor, Mich.; two sons, Rick, 31, of Lima and Jeff, 28, of Marysville, Md.; and a daughter, Shelly, 27, of Alton, Md.

Funeral arrangements will be announced by Dunbar Funeral Home.

USC'S MORRISON DIES—COACH HAS HEART ATTACK AFTER PLAYING RACQUETBALL

COLUMBIA.—Joe Morrison, head football coach at the University of South Carolina, and for 14 seasons the New York Giants' "Old Dependable," died Sunday night of a heart attack. He was 51.

Morrison had been playing racquetball at the university and was found collapsed in the shower, Providence Hospital spokeswoman Dawn Catalano said.

"He was not feeling well, apparently went to the shower and was found in the shower collapsed when they started CPR (cardiopulmonary resuscitation) on him," she said.

She said Morrison was alive, but unconscious when he was brought to the hospital at 8:44 p.m. EST. He was pronounced dead at 9:03 p.m.

Ricky Diggs, South Carolina's running back coach, saw Morrison just hours before his death.

"He seemed fine. He was upbeat, spirited and so forth," Diggs said. "Racquetball is one of his biggest pastimes when he has the chance to get some exercise. It just came as a big shock to everyone. It never even crossed my mind that anything like this could happen."

Catalano said Morrison had a history of heart problems and previously had been hospitalized for that condition.

He has undergone an angio-plasty procedure, which clears blockage in arteries.

News of Morrison's death moved swiftly throughout the state.

"I don't think anything could have been more devastating than to find out it was the death of Coach Morrison," said associate athletic director Harold White.

"I feel like I've been kicked in the stomach," said assistant athletic director Art Baker.

"All of our athletic family at Clemson, coaches as well as fans, send their condolences to his family and to the family members of the University of South Carolina," said Clemson head football coach Danny Ford. "They have lost an outstanding person, and an outstanding football coach, one that we have enjoyed competing against on the field and associating with off the field."

Morrison previously coached at Tennessee-Chattanooga and New Mexico. His career record was 101-72-7 over 16 seasons.

He was 39-28-2 in six seasons at South Carolina, including 8-4 in 1988, when he took the Gamecocks to the Liberty Bowl, where they lost to Indiana 34-10.

Morrison was the 1984 Walter Camp national coach of the year after South Carolina went 10-2, losing to Oklahoma State 21-14 in the Gator Bowl.

He was born on Aug. 21, 1937, and grew up in Lima, Ohio. At Cincinnati, he set school records in scoring, passing and rushing and twice was named to the All Missouri Valley Conference team.

At Cincinnati, he led the Bearcats in rushing (467 yards) and receiving (27 receptions for 303 yards) in 1958. He played in the 1959 College All-Star Game, Senior Bowl and North-South All-Star Game.

He graduated from Cincinnati in 1959, was drafted in the third round by the Giants and went on to play 14 years for New York, earning the nickname "Old Dependable" for his clutch play.

He was named Most Valuable Player by the NFL Touchdown Club in 1972, his final season. The Giants that year retired his No. 40.

Morrison is the Giants' all-time leader in receptions with 395 covering 4,993 yards and 47 touchdowns. He gained 2,472 yards rushing in his career on 677 carries, scoring 18 rushing touchdowns.

His 65 career touchdowns rank him fourth in the history of the Giants with 390 points.

"He was such a versatile player," Giants owner Wellington Mara said. "He was the ultimate team player. He would do anything you asked him. Run the ball, catch, play on the special teams, anything."

Morrison began his coaching career at Tennessee-Chattanooga after former Giants teammate Sam Huff recommended him for the job. The Moccasins went 4-7 in each of his first two seasons, then went 5-5-1 in 1975.

Over his final four seasons there, Morrison coached the team to records of 6-4-1, 9-1-1, 7-3-1 and 9-2, respectively, winning the Southern Conference championship three times.

He moved to New Mexico in 1970 and the Lobos went 4-7 in his first two seasons at Albuquerque. New Mexico went 10-1 in 1982, its only loss 40-12 to Brigham Young.

South Carolina hired him on Dec. 5, 1982. The Gamecocks went 5-6 in his first season, then went 10-2 in 1984, rising as high as second in The Associated Press rankings before a 38-21 loss to Navy on Nov. 17. The Gamecocks finished 1988 ranked 11th.

South Carolina was 5-6 in 1985, 3-6-2 in 1986 and 8-4 in 1987, finishing with a 20-16 loss to eventual national champion Miami of Florida and a 30-13 loss to Louisiana State in the Gator Bowl.

In 1988, the Gamecocks won their first six games before losing to Georgia Tech 34-0. South Carolina rebounded to beat North Carolina State 23-7 before a 59-0 loss to Florida State. The regular season ended with a 29-10 loss at Clemson and the loss in the Liberty Bowl on Dec. 28. The Gamecocks were ranked as high as eighth in each of the past two seasons.

Morrison is survived by his wife, the former JeVena Armstrong, a sister, Ann Moeller, and a daughter.

SPORTS WORLD MOURNS "THE MAN IN BLACK"

The death of University of South Carolina Coach Joe Morrison shocked not only a passionate following of Gamecock supporters but a legion of American football fans who remember his pluck and skills as a professional player.

In addition to his record as a winner, Joe Morrison endeared many with his laid-back, low-key style, a stark contrast to the sometimes flamboyant and evangelistic approach of his predecessors.

After starring as a University of Cincinnati quarterback-running back, the coach toiled 14 years for the New York Giants in the National Football League. The versatile star, known as "Old Dependable" and "Mr. Everything," was team captain seven years, most valuable player three times and performed at eight different positions. His jersey number, 40, was retired. They called him everything from a complete player to one with intensive desire and one of the smartest. "He would do anything you asked him," said Giants owner Wellington Mara. "run the ball, catch, play on the special teams, anything."

It surprised none of his colleagues that this natural coach, would become a Mr. Fixit of bankrupt college programs. He won big at Tennessee-Chattanooga and at New Mexico before taking over Gamecock football fortunes in 1983, bringing national attention to the program not only with his successes on the field but through his legion of friends in the athletic establishment.

At USC, this impassive figure will be remembered in different ways, depending on perspective.

He will be remembered most for establishing a winning program, leading his squads to a 39-28-2 record over six years. Fans will fondly recall 1984 when, in his second year, he took a crowd-pleasing eleven from nowhere to the Gator Bowl and was named national coach of the year.

But he will also be remembered as the man in black who made that color a USC mania. He was the stoic who, at least outwardly, never exulted over a victory or wept about a loss.

He was the man who called his players "young men," not kids, even when some disappointed him by getting in highly publicized scrapes.

Coach Morrison was the man who delegated heavily to his staff and expected performance in return.

A lover of golf, horse racing and car racing, he was criticized by the sanctimonious for his laid-back style and his publicized personal problems, but he always appeared unruffled and the bumper stickers continued to extol him.

He will also be remembered as the man who strolled expressionlessly on the sidelines, a cigarette dangling from his lips. Doctors urged Coach Morrison, who had a history of heart problems, to chuck the habit after he was hospitalized with a heart condition. But he continued to smoke, although he appeared immune to the stress and pressure generated from those unhappy with USC's three losing bowl performances during his tenure and his players' off-the-field antics.

Coach Morrison died Sunday following a game of racquetball, the victim of a heart attack. Although his last season ended on sour notes, he died a winner. He leaves thousands of grieving friends, a program that has reached a zenith and an outstanding football legacy, ranging from high school to professional, from player to coach. He will be remembered as a rebuilder of football fortunes.

THE STATE OF MATHEMATICS AND SCIENCE EDUCATION

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I rise today to comment on an issue of great importance to this nation—the current state of mathematics and science education in our schools.

The research and development activities conducted in this country are diverse, yet all require a steady supply of scientists and engineers. Since 1976, the demand for scientists and engineers in every sector of the U.S. economy has increased 85 percent, and the Bureau of Labor reports that an average of 138,500 jobs requiring engineering degrees will open in every year between 1982 and 1995.

The problem we face is that our supply of scientists and engineers is declining at precisely the time that demand is rising, thus creating a crisis of great proportions which will stifle our Nation's economic and technological development. Our children are simply not competitive with children of other countries in mathematics and science skills.

Let me share with my colleagues some disturbing statistics. Currently, 67 percent of all elementary school science teachers fail to meet the National Science Teacher's Association's minimum certification requirements. In our Nation's 24,000 high schools, 7,000 offer no physics course, 4,000 offer no chemistry and 2,000 offer no biology. Furthermore, one in three high schools in this Nation do not offer enough mathematics to enable even the best student to enter engineering school. Of the number of university faculty positions available in engineering, 7.5 percent, or 1,500, are currently vacant—most for over a year. The result is that we are producing a new generation of scientifically and technically illiterate citizens during the time when the United States is in the midst of the most important technological revolution since the 18th century.

A recent Washington Post article entitled "Survey of Math, Science Skills Puts U.S. Students at Bottom" further underscores the point. This report concludes that in an international comparison of mathematics skills, foreign students perform at a rate four times higher than American students. In mathematics, 40 percent of foreign students showed an understanding of measurement and geometry concepts, compared to 9 percent of Americans, and 78 percent of foreign students could solve two-step problems such as averaging, compared to 40 percent of American students. Clearly, this Nation faces a serious challenge in education.

My support for enhanced mathematics and science education activities in our Nation's school systems is widely known. It is easy for anyone to propose badly needed programs: in-service preparation for teachers, technological improvements, stimulating our brightest students to choose careers in science education and others. What is more difficult, however, is for the Federal, State, and local governments to fund these activities. In Oregon, for example, many school districts can graphically illustrate their increasing needs in science education yet are unable to fulfill these demands because of funding deficiencies.

Strong leadership is needed at this crucial juncture; if our children's math and science skills do not improve, our increased technical dependence will be devastating. The Federal Government must define its role and must look to business and industry for cooperation in responding to this emerging crisis. In my view, this issue is one of the greatest challenges currently facing our Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the aforementioned Washington Post article be printed in the RECORD.

SURVEY OF MATH, SCIENCE SKILLS PUTS U.S. STUDENTS AT BOTTOM

(By Barbara Vobejda)

An international comparison of mathematics and science skills released yesterday shows American 13-year-olds scoring at the bottom, with South Korean students performing at high levels in math at four times the rate of U.S. students.

In both math and science, U.S. students also scored worse or no better than students in the three European countries and four Canadian provinces who also participated in the survey.

In math, 40 percent of South Korean students showed an understanding of measurement and geometry concepts, for example, compared to 9 percent of Americans, and 78 percent of South Korean students could solve two-step problems such as finding an average, compared to 40 percent of Americans.

In science, more than 73 percent of the students in South Korea could use scientific procedures and analyze science data—design experiments and draw conclusions, for example—compared to 42 percent of American students.

"Few comparisons are more odious than the ones embodied in this little book," said Bassam Z. Shakhashiri, assistant director for science and engineering education at the National Science Foundation. "The lack of preparation for further education and future employment that these American teen-agers demonstrated is nothing short of frightening."

The report, funded by the National Science Foundation and the Department of Education, compared math and science performance in the United States, South Korea, the United Kingdom, Ireland, Spain, and the Canadian provinces of British Columbia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec. In New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec, French- and English-speaking populations were assessed separately.

All students were given the same 63 math questions and 60 science questions, translated for non-English-speaking populations. About 1,000 American students participated in the survey, which was based on representative samples in each country.

The study was the latest evidence of low science and math achievement among American youngsters, particularly in contrast to their counterparts in many Asian countries. A 1986 study of fifth graders showed that even the highest-scoring Americans performed below Japanese of all levels. And a national study released last June found that nearly half of American 17-year-olds cannot perform math problems normally taught in junior high school.

Officials at the Educational Testing Service (ETS), which administered the study, tied the results to the nation's future economic position. "It's a pretty accurate prophecy of what the 23-year-olds of 1999 will be able to do," said Archie Lapointe, executive director of the Center for the Assessment of Educational Progress at ETS.

In math, the countries fell into three groups, with South Korean students achieving the highest average score, 568 on a scale of 1,000. The second tier included British Columbia, English- and French-speaking populations of Quebec and English-speaking students in New Brunswick. The third tier included English-speaking students in Ontario, the French-speaking population in New Brunswick, Spain, the United Kingdom and Ireland.

The lowest-ranking teir included French-speaking Ontario and the United States, where the average score was 473.9.

In science, participants fell into three groups, with British Columbia and Korea at the top, and the United States, Ireland and the French-speaking populations in Ontario and New Brunswick at the bottom. The other countries and provinces ranked in a middle tier.

Ironically, when asked if they are good at math, 68 percent of American students agreed, compared to 23 percent of South Korean students.

While the study did not analyze why students in some countries performed better than others, Albert Shanker, president of the American Federation of Teachers, argued at a news conference yesterday that very little science is taught in American elementary schools, and most elementary teachers have very little science background.

The study showed that the more time a student spent watching television, the poorer the performance in math and science. It did not assess whether frequent television watching caused poor performance.

COMMENTS ON THE NCADD YOUTH REPORT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, in 1982 President Reagan convened a bipartisan Commission to investigate the problem of drunk driving. He charged this Commission with the task of formulating a national plan of action to combat a problem he termed "a national disgrace." I was one of two Senators privileged to serve on the President's Commission, and much to my satisfaction, the recommendations that we, as a Commission, made have gained widespread approval.

In 1984 I supported the passage of a bill that encouraged States to raise their legal purchase and possession age to 21, and in the past 5 years, I have watched with satisfaction as all 50 States enacted legislation to comply with that bill. Today, a uniform purchase and possession age of 21 now exists nationally, and it has been credited with making a significant contribution to the declining number of youth who die annually in alcohol-related motor vehicle crashes.

A uniform national purchase and possession age of 21 is an important advance in the fight to end drunk and impaired driving by young people. But it is only one measure, and by itself cannot solve the problem. Youthful impaired driving is a complex problem that demands a multidimensional response. Preventive education, effective law enforcement, and alcohol treatment are all vital components of a national strategy to eliminate drunk and impaired driving.

A comprehensive approach was the hallmark of the Presidential Commission's report in 1983, and it is the distinguishing feature of the latest report issued by its successor organization, the National Commission Against Drunk Driving. In its report, entitled "Youthful Driving Without Impairment," the National Commission advocates the adoption of a nine-part model designed to integrate the efforts of parents, teachers, employers, citizen activists, law enforcement agents, judges, and the professional treatment community. As the National Commission's report states, "our best hope of countering the pervasiveness of youth impaired driving lies in formulating an integrated systemwide approach that will present people with a consistent message that under age drinking and impaired driving are intolerable."

Despite encouraging evidence that alcohol-related youth fatalities are declining, young people under the age 21 continue to remain overrepresented in drunk and impaired driving crashes. Although youth under age 21 comprise only 8 percent of the driving population, they accounted for 17 percent of the drivers involved in alcohol-related fatal crashes in 1987. Clearly, greater attention and additional efforts will be required to stop youth for drinking and driving.

The National Commission's report represents a step toward that goal. As a member of the Commission's Board of Trustees, I believe that the report deserves our thoughtful attention and full support. For that reason, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the report's executive summary be printed here. I urge everyone to read this summary. Copies of the entire report can be obtained from the National Commission Against Drunk Driving, 1140 Connecticut Avenue, suite 804, Washington, DC 20036. Please join me in supporting the efforts of the National Commission to rid our country of this national disgrace.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The National Commission Against Drunk Driving, working with a grant from the National Highway Tariff Administration, conducted five public hearings in 1987-88 on the problem of youth impaired driving. From the wealth of testimony gathered in Chicago, Boston, Seattle, Atlanta and Fort Worth, many recommendations were adopted for this report.

A review of the proceedings reveals one paramount conclusion: the time has not arrived yet when we can rest content with what has been done to address the problem of youth impaired driving. Despite the spread of activist groups, the proliferation of programs, and the passage of much-needed legislation, young people continue to drink and drive with alarming frequency. Over the course of the past five years, it has become illegal for youth under age 21 to purchase and possess alcohol in every state. Nevertheless, young people continue to be involved in alcohol-related crashes at disproportionately high rates. A young person under the legal drinking age remains nearly twice as likely to die in an alcohol-related crash as an adult over 21.

Youth impaired driving cannot be solved without addressing the problem of underage drinking. Testifiers at the hearings summarized the situation:

Drinking is endemic among American youth.

Alcoholic beverages remain easily accessible to youth under 21.

Peer pressure encourages young people to drink and leads many adolescents to consider alcohol a necessary accompaniment to social events.

Advertising normalizes alcohol consumption and makes it more difficult to raise concerns about alcohol abuse.

Drinking decreases inhibitions in young people who all too frequently possess a propensity for taking risks and naively believe that they will not be harmed.

The combination of these factors leads to a tragically predictable result: alcohol-related motor vehicle crashes constitute the leading cause of death for youth of driving age.

The NCADD-sponsored hearings confirmed that youth impaired driving is a societal problem which will not be resolved in the short term or by a single approach. Changing the attitude of youth toward impaired driving and, more fundamentally, toward underage drinking requires a sustained coordinated effort. Youth must be presented with the single message from all elements of the community that under-age drinking and impaired driving are socially intolerable.

Testimony repeatedly emphasized the pivotal role parents play in preventing youth inpaired driving. According to a University of Washington survey, parents are the most important influence on a youth's decision not to use alcohol or other drugs. Similarly, when a Michigan State University survey asked high school students what factors would reduce the amount of alcohol they consumed, 70 to 90 percent responded that parental actions such as supervising parties, keeping a closer control over home alcohol supplies, and making a greater effort to discuss their weekend activities would reduce their drinking habits.

Unfortunately, all too many parents have abdicated their responsibilities. Testifiers described encounters with parents who criticized police officers for arresting juvenile DWI offenders, parents who fought protracted legal battles to prevent the revocation of their child's driving license, and parents who, in the face of overwhelming evidence, steadfastly denied the existence of their child's drinking problem. These actions, one testifier noted, not only undermine the efforts of those who work to reduce youth impaired driving but fuel the young person's sense of being victimized by the system.

The reaction of these parents to the enforcement of drinking and driving laws emphasizes the need for education to inform parents about the scope of the impaired driving problem. Findings by Michigan State University researchers confirmed this need: while 60 to 70 percent of parents are convinced that underage drinking occurs, only 20 percent believe that their own children are involved in such behavior. This statistic dramatically illustrates the unwillingness of parents to acknowledge the involvement of their children in underage drinking.

The hearings made it clear that every systemwide approach must combine prevention, deterrence and treatment/intervention. Preventive education for youth must start at an early age, before young people are first confronted with the decision to use alcohol or other drugs. With young people beginning, on a national average, to first use alcohol at 12.8 years of age, education clearly must start in elementary school. It must be designed to provide children with information on alcohol and drug use, but it must also teach them the skills they need to act on that information and resist pressure from friends and family to use alcohol and other drugs.

In providing youth with alcohol education and skills, considerable care should be given to selecting appropriately qualified teachers, for the teacher is the most important variable in the success of the program. These teachers should be good role models, trusted by students, and want to teach the subject.

In addition to maximizing the value of formal classroom instruction, educators should take full advantage of the possibilities of peer education. Testifiers cited numerous examples of programs involving high school youth who volunteer to work with junior high or elementary school children on highway safety and alcohol and drug issues. Like peer education, positive peer pressure has a tremendous potential for altering attitudes about drinking and driving. By banding together to form safety clubs and support groups, youth can encourage their peers to value a health lifestyle and socially-responsible behavior.

The single most controversial topic of the hearings was the safe rides programs. Supporters of safe rides programs contend that intervention is needed in the less-than-perfect world where young people drink illegally and subsequently drive. Advocates of more prevention-oriented approaches emphasized that efforts to counter youth impaired driving must address the underlying problem of underage drinking by emphasizing a no-use approach. In its recommendations, the NCADD recognizes the value of both arguments, acknowledging the need to take positive steps to discourage underage drinking while recognizing the importance of intervention measures that make our highways safer for everyone.

While prevention education is important, it alone is not sufficient to deter youths from drinking and driving. Enforcement is also necessary. Testifiers complained of a lack of enforcement. Both youth and police agreed that young people are not subject to the same level of rigorous enforcement as the older adult population. To increase the effectiveness of enforcement, testifiers suggested that police target youthful impaired driving by focusing their shift schedules and patrols on the hours when most impaired driving offenses by youth occur. Police should also patrol parks, schools, and other neighborhood locations where youth tend to gather. When youth are arrested for drinking and driving violations, they should be subject to the full penalty of the law. Releasing youth to their parents, like downgrading their offenses or diverting them into pre-adjudication programs, conveys the impression to the young offenders as well as to their parents that youthful impaired driving is not a serious offense.

The evidence suggests that communities with the best record of reducing youthful drinking and driving have succeeded by formulating an integrated, systemwide approach. If the hearings revealed one thing, it was that many good programs and successful countermeasures exist. The key is for communities to put all of these elements in place, so that the efforts of students, parents, schools, courts, businesses and police supported one another. Only when all nine components that came under so much discussion during the youthful impaired hearings are put in place can we look forward to significant reductions in the serious injuries and fatalities involving thousands of young Americans. Each community must confront this serious social issue if we are to ensure that this campaign to counter youthful impaired driving is a truly national campaign. No one will admit that this is an easy challenge—but who would deny it is a challenge that every community must accept!

VENTURE CAPITAL GAINS LEGISLATION

Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to restore a modest capital gains tax incentive for venture capital investments, the Venture Capital Gains Act.

I am delighted to be joined in this effort by Senators DECONCINI, DIXON, GORE, INOUYE, SANFORD, DASCHLE, HEFLIN, SASSER, DODD, KERRY, BURDICK, and BOSCHWITZ.

Capital gains is now a bipartisan issue. It is not a Republican issue. Senate Democrats want to debate the capital gains issue on the merits and to join in fashioning a reasonable and effective incentive for capital formation.

I come to the capital gains debate with impeccable credentials.

In 1978 I supported the Hansen-Steiger amendment to reduce the tax rate on capital gains investments.

In 1981 I opposed the proposal to lower the capital gains tax rate from 28 to 20 percent.

In 1982 I opposed the proposal to index the basis of capital gains assets and the proposal to reduce the capital gains holding period from 1 year to 6 months.

In 1984 I again opposed the proposal to reduce the holding period for capital gains from 1 year to 6 months.

In 1987 I first introduced the Venture Capital Gains Act.

In 1988 I again opposed the proposal to index the basis of capital gains assets.

And now in 1989 I am reintroducing the Venture Capital Gains Act.

I have outlined my positions on the capital gains issue to make one point:

I favor capital gains incentive if it is reasonable and effective.

I do not favor an unlimited, wide-open capital gains incentive that breaks-the-bank on Government revenues.

I am moderate and pragmatic on the capital gains issue.

I will stand up and say "enough is enough" and I will take the lead in trying to fashion a reasonable, moderate and pragmatic middle ground.

I support a capital gains incentive that encourages and rewards risky investments, long-term investments and growth-oriented investments.

That is what America needs to compete in international markets.

And that is what the Venture Capital Gains Act would do.

It encourages investments in small business ventures.

It encourages investors to put capital directly into the hands of entrepreneurs.

It encourages investors to seek long-term growth by requiring that the stock be held for at least 4 years.

It discourages investors to make these investments to avoid paying their fair share in Federal income tax. Any gains on the sale of stock are covered by the minimum tax, ensuring that wealthy investors do not reduce their tax liability below 21 percent.

Investments in small business ventures are risky. Startup businesses often fail completely.

There investments are long-term. Few startup businesses generate any dividends in the first 4 years.

These investments are growth-oriented. Every study shows that small businesses account for most of the new jobs created in the United States.

This incentive is needed. We know that small businesses have a very difficult time obtaining the capital they need to grow.

This problem is even worse with the tax reform legislation, which puts a premium on low-risk, short-term, income-producing investments.

Most important this bill provides an incentive for venture capital that is fiscally responsible.

I do not claim that this bill will magically reduce tax rates and increase Government revenue. I am willing to accept the judgment of the Joint Committee on Taxation and of the Treasury Department that this bill loses some revenue.

I opposed the 1981 supply side tax cut. I said then that it was excessive and would lead to deficits that would choke a mule. I was right. You can't cut tax rates without losing some revenue.

But, the amount of revenue which is lost from this bill is affordable. The official estimates are that my bill will lose one-one-hundredth as much revenue as the capital gains proposal advanced by the President during the campaign.

So, if we want to promote investments which will help America compete, we need to focus on the small business ventures which will create tomorrow's technologies, markets, and jobs.

That is what the Venture Capital Gains Act would do.

It takes the whole debate on capital gains back to its roots.

It invites America's investors to become venture capitalists.

I hope that President Bush will revise his campaign proposal and become a venture capitalist himself.

I ask unanimous consent that a chart summarizing the differences between my bill and the President's capital gains proposal, as described during the campaign, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the chart was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPARISON OF CAPITAL GAINS PROPOSALS

	Bush campaign	Senator Bumpers
Maximum tax rate	15 percent	21 percent.
Exclusion on gain	Unknown	25 percent.
Holding period	1 yr	4 yrs—Favors long-term investments.

INFANT MORTALITY AND CHILDREN'S HEALTH ACT OF 1989

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I rise today to join my distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Senator BRADLEY, in sponsoring legislation designed to continue the expansion of Medicaid coverage for pregnant women and children.

Over the last several years the Congress has worked diligently to improve access to Medicaid coverage for pregnant women and children. We must continue this important effort as infant mortality remains a critical problem in our society.

The Children's Defense Fund document entitled, "The Health of America's Children", reports that during the 1950–55 period, the United States ranked sixth best on infant mortality among 20 industrialized countries. By the 1980–85 period, the Nation had fallen to a tie for last place among the same countries.

The Institute of Medicine has determined that the most critical step we can take to address infant mortality is to expand access to early prenatal care and services for infants in the first year of life. The IOM determined that quality prenatal care could reduce the incidence of low birthweight babies by 15 percent among white infants and 12 percent among black infants.

They also found that this approach is extremely cost effective; for every $1 spent, $3 would be saved in the first year of the infant's life, and saves up to $11 in total medical expenses over the lifetime of the child.

The legislation we are introducing today will continue to build upon the improvements in services for low-income pregnant women and their children enacted over the last several years.

In the 100th Congress we passed legislation which mandates that States cover all pregnant women and infants up to 100 percent of poverty by July 1, 1990. In the bill we are introducing today, States would be required to cover pregnant women and infants with incomes below 125 percent of poverty as of July 1, 1991, 150 percent of poverty as of July 1, 1992, and 185 percent of poverty as of July 1, 1993.

States must currently extend Medicaid coverage to all children born after September 30, 1983, in families with incomes and resources below State AFDC standards, up to age 7. The legislation we are introducing today would expand upon that mandate to require that States phase-in coverage for children born after September 30, 1989, up to age 18 in families with incomes below 100 percent of poverty.

This legislation includes important provisions which are intended to improve access to pediatrician and OB/GYN services. The bill also includes provisions which will mandate States to provide continuous Medicaid coverage to women 60 days post partum and make the WIC Nutrition Program more accessible to Medicaid-eligible pregnant women and children.

I look forward to working with Senator BRADLEY and others to see that we continue to expand Medicaid coverage for pregnant women and children. Our commitment to good prenatal care, well baby care and preventive health care for older children, represents a prudent investment which will have a significant and long lasting effect upon the health and future of the Nation's poorest children.

I urge my colleagues to support this important bill.

TRIBUTE TO MAURICE W. "MO" CASTLE

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is with great sorrow that I rise today to inform my colleagues of the death of Maurice W. Castle from Mobile, AL. "Mo," as he was affectionately called died of a heart attack on December 1, 1988, at the age of 70.

Mo Castle worked his entire adult life to make Mobile a better place to live. He was respected by all who knew him and the impact he had on thousands of lives in Mobile may never be appreciated fully. He approached each task with incredible vigor whether it was the circuit court, the newspaper, or golf. Mo served with distinction the past 10 years as the Mobile County circuit court clerk. His work as circuit court clerk was characterized by the same tenacity, ability, and knowledge he displayed during his career as a newspaperman.

Mo spent most of his life pursuing his first love, the newspaper business. His nose for news made him incredibly suited for this career. He began his climb up the news ladder at the age of 19, when he joined the Mobile Press Register as a copyboy. From this first job in 1937 until he left the paper in 1978, Mo gained the respect of his superiors and his peers alike. In 1958, he became the city editor for the Mobile Press Register and served brilliantly in this capacity for 22 years.

Mo Castle was an outstanding man and a good friend. He did much to shape opinion in Mobile and ensured that the Mobile Press Register maintained high journalistic standards. True to his sharply honed reporter's instincts, he always kept his eyes and ears peeled for news. He always had reporter's blood and the inherent concern with what goes on in the world and how it affects people. He was a caring person.

Mr. President, Mo's family and many friends will greatly miss his sharp wit and his compassionate manner. Indeed, the entire city should mourn the passing of such a great Mobilian. He tried his best to improve life in Mobile and in my judgment, he always succeeded. I will miss him greatly. I ask unanimous consent that the following articles describing Mo Castle's life be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMEMBERING "MO" CASTLE

(By Ralph Poore)

The death of Maurice W. "Mo" Castle Jr. from a heart attack Thursday struck everyone in The Mobile Press Register newsroom as a personal loss.

Castle was the Mobile County Circuit Court clerk for the past 10 years, but began a newspaper career in 1937 that lasted until 1978.

Castle had retired from his post as city editor of The Mobile Press a year before I joined the Press as a reporter, so I never worked for him. Nevertheless, because so many of the other reporters always had a favorite story about life in the newsroom under Castle, I often felt as though I had been one of his reporters.

Besides, in my time of covering the Mobile County Courthouse beat, Castle often took a lot of time with me to talk about his years at the newspaper and to ask me what was going on in the newsroom now. He was always ready with a news tip and could be counted on to get you through the courthouse maze to the information you needed.

Castle, 19 years old and just out of high school, came to work for The Mobile Press Register in 1937 as a copyboy. The newspaper no longer has copyboys. Long before they ceased to exist, they stopped being called copyboys and were given the name of copy clerks, supposedly dignifying the position.

Their function was to come running whenever an editor yelled "copyboy!" or sometimes just "copy." They were to take the copy that had just been edited to the typesetters. Copyboys also often did all the office "gopher" jobs.

From copyboy, Castle advanced through the ranks to the city editor, a post he held for 22 years.

Castle worked with some of the reporters who have become legends of newspapering in Mobile: Ted Pearson; Ed Lee, who also died earlier this year; John Will, in whose name the Mobile Chapter of the Society of Professional Journalists, Sigma Delta Chi, presents scholarships each year; Maryln Schwartz and others.

Knowing Castle's long history with the newspaper, I naturally turned to him early this year and asked him to write something about his life for the Mobile Register's 175th anniversary special section. His response was overwhelming.

Fortunately, for the history of this newspaper and its place in the history of the city, Castle wrote a long, detailed and interesting account of the people he had known.

Mo, as everyone called him, won't soon be forgotten by the people who put The Mobile Press Register together every day. We all have enough stories to keep telling and retelling for many years to come.

That gives those of us in the newspaper business a sense of continuity and identity with all those who have come before and with all of those who will come in the future.

[From the Mobile Press Register, Dec. 4, 1988]

"MO" TO BE MISSED

Maurice W. "Mo" Castle Jr., who died Thursday of a heart ailment, will perhaps be remembered by the general public as an efficient although low-key Mobile County Circuit Court clerk for the past decade. For those of us fortunate enough to have known him well, Castle will always be remembered as a newspaperman—one of the best ever in Mobile.

Castle was a respected reporter before he began a long stint as this newspaper's city editor prior to his retirement here and subsequent appointment to the courthouse position.

Castle's greatest attributes were his knowledge and love of Mobile and the people who live here and a rare nose for news that he carried with him to his death.

It was especially tragic that Castle, 70, died only about a month before he was to begin a well-deserved retirement which everyone assumed would be spent on area golf courses.

As an integral part of his life for decades, we share the grief and terrible sense of loss experienced by his wife, Lucy Castle; a daughter, Julie Castle of Atlanta; a son, Wilson Castle, a student at the University of Alabama in Tuscaloosa; and two brothers, John H. Castle and Robert "Rick" Castle, both of Mobile.

CIRCUIT COURT CLERK, NEWSPAPERMAN DIES

Maurice W. "Mo" Castle Jr., Mobile County Circuit Court clerk and a longtime newspaperman, died Thursday at a Mobile hospital.

Castle, 70, had a history of heart problems.

He was to retire as clerk of the court when his current six-year term expires in January.

Castle was appointed to the job in 1978 to serve the remaining four years of the term of John Mandeville, who had retired.

He was elected without opposition to a full six-year term in 1982.

Castle was city editor of The Mobile Press Register from 1956 until his court appointment.

Castle joined the Press Register in 1937 as a copy clerk and a year later became a reporter. He served in the U.S. Army Air Force from 1942-45, worked at Brookley Air Force Base after being discharged and returned to the newspaper in 1947 as a reporter covering the courts.

During his career, Castle covered the police beat, city hall, waterfront, school board and federal offices.

"He was a loyal, dedicated employee. He had the best contacts with the news sources in Mobile that we've ever had. He was loyal and dedicated and a good newspaperman," Mobile Press Register publisher William J. Hearin said.

"He was a true professional," said Press Register executive editor Tom Taylor, who worked with Castle for more than 20 years. "He knew this town like the back of his hand, and his contributions, both as a newsman and court official, were many."

Mobile County Circuit Judge Douglas Johnstone said Castle was "an outstanding clerk who promoted harmony in the office."

Johnstone said Castle had "high standards of careful record keeping and filing and provided efficient service to the public."

"He was a wonderful newspaperman before he came to us," added Johnstone.

"He was a fine public servant who did an excellent job as clerk of the court," commented Judge Michael Zoghby.

"We at the courthouse will miss his smiling face and jovial laughter, as well as his expertise as clerk of the court," added Zoghby.

Castle was an avid golfer, with the distinction of being the only person who has had a hole-in-one on each of the four par three holes of Spring Hill College golf course.

Castle got his first two aces within five days of each other in 1964. He got his third ace about a year later and the fourth in 1983. He also had a fifth hole-in-one at Gulf Pines golf course.

He is survived by his wife, Lucy Castle; a daughter, Julie Castle of Atlanta; a son, Wilson Castle, a student at the University of Alabama in Tuscaloosa; and two brothers, John H. Castle and Robert "Rick" Castle, both of Mobile.

The family suggests that memorials be made to Trinity Episcopal Church.

Funeral arrangements will be announced.

Funeral services will be held Saturday morning Dec. 3, 1988 from Trinity Episcopal Church.

TRIBUTE TO JAMES R. McADORY, JR.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is with great sadness that I rise today, to inform my colleagues of the recent death of Mr. James R. McAdory, Jr., from Birmingham, AL, at the age of 67. He had worked for the Birmingham News for almost 40 years before his retirement in 1986.

James McAdory, Jr., was an intelligent and talented man who left a wide trail of influence on Birmingham. He touched thousands of lives for not only was he a respected newspaper man but also a devoted church goer. He cared greatly about people and his attitude shone through in both his editorials and in his personal life.

James knew the Birmingham News and the newspaper business inside-out. His four decades with the paper saw him rise from copy clerk to editorial page editor. In between, his quest for learning was fulfilled in positions ranging from reporter to assistant managing editor. His devotion and personal curiosity guaranteed that he would succeed at all posts.

While James graduated from Birmingham-Southern College, his thirst for knowledge followed him throughout his life. He was widely known as one of the most informed and politically astute people in the State. As a conservative, he remained particularly interested in those issues he editorialized in the paper, such as the national defense and the national debt.

Like many others of his caliber, James was not content to give of himself only through his career. He was involved in community activities and especially in his church. James played an active role in St. Luke's Episcopal Church. He was a eucharistic minister and a lay Scripture reader. He was also committed to helping others and taught religious education classes to adults in his church.

James R. McAdory, Jr., made a profound impact on life in Birmingham. His memory will be cherished by his family and by all those whose lives he touched. He was a good friend and I will miss him greatly.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article telling of James R. McAdory, Jr.'s accomplishments be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RETIRED NEWSMAN McADORY DIES AT 67

James R. McAdory, Jr., retired editorial page editor of The Birmingham News, died Tuesday at age 67 after a lengthy illness.

McAdory, of 4120 Churchill Circle in Birmingham, worked for The News for almost 40 years, rising from copy clerk to reporter to several editing positions before taking over the editorial page in 1972.

That position came in a swap with Editor James E. Jacobson, who filled McAdory's post as assistant managing editor in 1972.

Tuesday night, Jacobson described McAdory as "a man of high principle and strong opinions who didn't hesitate to speak out on them."

Other co-workers described McAdory, a graduate of Birmingham-Southern College, as intelligent and well-read on the issues he addressed as a conservative on the papers' editorial page.

Charles Brooks, who worked under McAdory as editorial cartoonist, said he enjoyed discussing his cartoon ideas with McAdory.

"Invariably he would surprise me with his knowledge about whatever subject came up," Brooks said.

In particular, McAdory kept current on defense issues, and in later years he emphasized the need to reduce the United States' national debt, Brooks said.

He said McAdory gained recognition across the state, and politicians frequently sought his advice on issues.

Retired News political reporter Al Fox said McAdory while assistant managing editor could remain easy-going while conveying a tough message to a reporter.

McAdory listened to reporters' ideas about news coverage, Fox said. "Most of the time, you'd have your day in court. Then when he said, 'My way,' you knew it was 'My way.'"

Brooks said McAdory talked often of his family—his wife Addie Lee, son James R. McAdory III, and daughter Carmen Angela McAdory.

After his retirement in November 1986, McAdory planned to donate a kidney to his daughter, but a medical examination revealed his illness, said McAdory's minister, the Rev. John Claypool of St. Luke's Episcopal Church.

Claypool, the rector of the church, said McAdory's daughter recently received a kidney and pancreas from another donor.

Before his illness, McAdory taught adult religious-education classes in the church and served as a lay Scripture reader and eucharistic minister, Claypool said.

Claypool visited McAdory several times after coming to the church in June 1987.

"He was very patient and courageous," Claypool said, "He bore his suffering with a lot of dignity."

The funeral is scheduled for 1 p.m. Thursday at the church, with burial in Ridout's-Southern Heritage Cemetery.

TRIBUTE TO DR. WINSTON A. EDWARDS

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise, today, with great sorrow to pay tribute to Dr. Winston A. Edwards of Wetumpka, AL, who died on November 1, 1988. Dr. Edwards was one of the last of a disappearing breed—the country doctor.

Dr. Edwards devoted his entire life to medicine and to serving others. He was truly a doctor from the old school. He honed his medical skills in World War II before returning to begin practicing at home. He was a talented and respected doctor whose shining reputation always preceded him.

In many areas, a kind of mystique surrounds the lives of this Nation's healers. They represent pillars of the community and wield a type of influence not unlike the power of religion. Dr. Edwards was this type of doctor. He was not always gentle with his patients and never recommended the easy remedy unless it was also the best remedy. But he had a heart of gold and loved everyone. He knew most people in Wetumpka and was the team doctor for the Wetumpka High School football team for decades.

Doctors are often judged by what position they reach in the medical hierarchy. As chief of staff of Elmore County Hospital, Dr. Edwards definitely succeeded by this standard. However, in my judgment, any discussion of a doctor's ability must also consider compassion. In this light, Dr. Edwards' greatness shone even brighter than before. He genuinely cared about people—all people. He never charged a minister and financial restrictions disappeared when patients walked through his door. All his patients received the same attention even if they were poor and unable to pay their bills. He was truly the model doctor—always ready to serve his community rather than ready for the community to serve him.

Mr. President, Wetumpka has lost one of its most outstanding citizens. Dr. Winston A. Edwards' death will be remembered for years but his life for even longer. He was a trusted friend and talented doctor. He will be missed by all who knew him.

TRIBUTE TO DR. JOHN W. NIXON

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am filled with sadness, today, as I inform my colleagues of the death of Dr. John W. Nixon of Birmingham, AL, at the age of 66. Dr. Nixon was an incredible man with many diverse talents and abilities. He was very prominent in Birmingham as a civil rights leader, as a dentist, and as an actor. Dr. Nixon touched thousands of lives and his death was a great loss to all of his friends and family.

Dr. Nixon was not a man who could be easily confined by the artificial boundries that often define groups. He represented the good in each of the groups but went beyond the limitations often associated with them. He was a successful dentist but still managed time for a grueling acting schedule. He was a leader in the civil rights movement as well as a successful businessman. His broad range of interests always brought a fresh outlook to his pursuits and constantly kept him busy.

Dr. Nixon was never one to remain satisfied with the status quo. He had the ability to imagine unconventional ways to challenge these seemingly entrenched ideas. He was born in Lakeland, FL, but moved to Birmingham in 1951, starting his dental practice. He soon began his rise to prominence which would earn him election as president of the NAACP during much of the stormy period of the 1960's racial turbulence. His steady leadership and firm guidance were definitely responsible for much of that organization's success at the time. He also helped ease racial tensions in the city through his involvement with Operation New Birmingham during the 1960's.

In addition to his dental practice and his civil rights work, Dr. Nixon was very involved in the community. He took an active role in the Sixth Avenue Baptist Church and was an associate minister there.

Much of Dr. Nixon's recent exposure came from his acting. His performances broke many racial barriers in Alabama theater including when he played the title role in "Othello" while all the other principals were white. He also ranked among the leading actors from the UAB Town and Gown Theater. He acted in numerous films with his best role coming in the 1986 film, "North and South II." Perhaps his most influential and lasting impact on theater will come from his work on "Speak of Me As I Am." This show, which Nixon began, will be featured in the February Smithsonian Institution celebration of Black History Month. The show has grown from the original one-man cast to a cast of 16 and is a credit to Dr. Nixon's great talent and ingenuity.

Dr. Nixon influenced thousands of people and provided an example for those who wish to make life better. His is not a visible legacy outside of his work in movies and plays, but a legacy of hope. It is this hope which he instilled in all he knew which has made Birmingham a better place and which will influence people he knew for years to come.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article and editorial describing Dr. John W. Nixon's accomplishments be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the materials was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Birmingham News, Dec. 20, 1988]

DR. NIXON, CIVIL RIGHTS LEADER, DIES

(By Doug Demmons)

Birmingham dentist, civil rights leader and actor Dr. John W. Nixon died Monday at University Hosptial after a brief illness. He was 66.

In a real life as varied as the characters he portrayed on stage, Dr. Nixon left his mark from the front lines of the local civil rights movement to his role in the television movie North and South II.

A native of Lakeland, Fla., Dr. Nixon came to Birmingham in 1951 to begin practicing dentistry and soon gained prominence as president of the Alabama NAACP during much of the turbulent 1960s.

"He has always been a most articulate person. He was always gifted in that way," said the Rev. Abraham Woods, president of the Birmingham Chapter of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. "He certainly brought credit to the leadership of the NAACP in those days."

Dr. Nixon said in a 1986 interview that acting was his childhood love, but practicality steered him to dentistry.

"My mother died when I was around 6, but I remember how theatrical she was. On Halloween, she would dress up in those wonderful costumes that she must have made herself and walk through the quarters and I walked with her," he said. "My stepmother was a teacher who was very much into poetry. By the time I was in college I considered myself quite a song-and-dance man."

Dr. Nixon said that after a college theatrical performance he was ready to devote full time to acting, but a chemistry professor said "I could starve to death in theater, but he had never heard of a dentist starving to death."

Dr. Nixon attended Union Academy in Bartow, Fla.; Bethune Cookman College, Fisk University and Meharry Medical College.

He helped organize Citizens Federal Savings and Loan Association and has been an associate minister at Sixth Avenue Baptist Church.

In 1976, he was appointed to the National Advisory Dental Research Council of the National Institutes of Health. He also has served on the state Board of Pensions and Security and as a member of the President's Cabinet at the University of Alabama.

As an actor, Dr. Nixon earned his biggest role in 1986 in North and South II. His other film credits include The Bear, Benny's Place with Lou Gossett, For Us The Living, James Baldwin's Go Tell It On The Mountain, and Charlotte Forten's Mission with Melba Moore.

Locally, Dr. Nixon was a leading actor at UAB Town and Gown Theater, said theater director James Hatcher.

"He made history in the performing arts in Alabama when he played the God role in an integrated performance of J.B. and again when he played the title role in Othello with all of the other principals being white," Hatcher said.

Dr. Nixon also began a one-man dramatic performance of black speeches, poems and compositions called Speak of Me As I Am. The show, now in its fourth year, has grown to a cast of 16 and will be featured by the Smithsonian Institution in its celebration of Black History Month in February.

"He had great dignity," Hatcher said. "He was a very imposing figure, both physically and vocally. He used his magnificent voice with great variety. It could be caressing. It could be inspiring. It could be thundering and heroic."

One of his sons, John Nixon Jr., said his father loved people and "was colorblind. He loved white people as much as black people, and anyone else.

"He loved the arts, and he loved dentistry," he said. "Most of all, he loved Birmingham. He was very proud of the city."

Nixon Jr. said his father was proud and supportive of Operation New Birmingham, which helped build a bridge between the white and black communities in the 1960s.

Visitation will be at 7 p.m. Wednesday at Sixth Avenue Baptist Church on Martin Luther King Jr. Drive. Funeral will be at 1 p.m. Thursday at the church, with burial at Elmwood Cemetery, Roberts directing.

Dr. Nixon is survived by two sons, John W. Nixon Jr. of Birmingham and Carl Henry Nixon of Houston, and a daughter, Melba Haley Nixon of Houston.

[From the Birmingham News, Dec. 20, 1988]

JOHN NIXON

Dr. John W. Nixon, who died Monday, was a man who filled many roles in his productive life. He was a dentist, a businessman, a civil rights leader, a civic leader and an actor. And he was successful in each field.

Born in the segregated South of 66 years ago, the Lakeland, Fla., native lived to see many, although not all, of the racial barriers fall in his adopted home of Birmingham and across the country—a process he hastened through his own efforts.

When Nixon came to Birmingham in 1951 to establish his dental practice, he could have chosen to blend quietly into the basically comfortable, although restricted, life enjoyed by black professionals of the era.

Instead, he became an advocate of change, joining the modern civil rights movement in its infancy and serving as president of the Alabama NAACP for several years in the 1960s.

During the past several years, Dr. Nixon took time from his many professional and civic activities to engage in his first love of acting, with more success than most would-be actors achieve in a lifetime.

But—perhaps without even realizing it—Nixon did more than become a successful dentist, businessman, actor and civic leader. He did more than leave his community a better place than he found it.

He became an example of a person who could move easily across the artificial boundaries of race and economic class, making friends wherever he went. Not all leaders can do that.

Dr. John W. Nixon will be missed.

TRIBUTE TO JEANETTE EDWARDS BARRETT

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise with great sadness, today, to inform my colleagues of the death of a great Alabamian—Wetumpka Mayor Jeanette Edwards Barrett on November 28, 1988. She became Wetumpka's first female mayor when she won her first term in 1984 and had just won reelection to a second term by an overwhelming 4-to-1 margin.

Mayor Barrett had come to be viewed as a very caring and effective mayor. Her dedication and spirit have inspired council members and the citizens alike. Before her election as mayor, Jeanette had served a 4-year term on the Wetumpka City Council and this experience obviously prepared her well for the job of mayor. In both jobs, she concentrated on improving life in Wetumpka rather than on personal acclaim.

Jeanette Barrett represents the type of public servant for whom we should all be thankful. She firmly believed in Wetumpka and led the efforts to attract new industry and jobs to the town. Mayor Barrett was a devoted woman who made a difference in each of her endeavors. This devotion can be seen in both her public life and her private life where she was a member of the First Baptist Church for 30 years and a gifted Sunday school teacher.

Mayor Barrett was a fine woman and an outstanding mayor. Her many talents and abilities will be sorely missed by Wetumpka and by all of Alabama. She has set a level of excellence against which all Wetumpka mayors will be judged.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these articles describing Mayor Barrett's accomplishments be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Montgomery (AL) Advertiser, Dec. 1, 1988]

JEANETTE BARRETT

The dedication of Saturday's Christmas on the Coosa holiday celebration to the memory of Jeanette Barrett is a fitting tribute to the woman who thought up the event.

Mrs. Barrett, elected mayor of Wetumpka in 1984, died Monday. A former state employee who was acting director of the Alabama Historical Commission before she went into local politics, Mrs. Barrett originated the concept of the boat parade and fireworks show which draws 30,000 people each December.

She concentrated on attracting new jobs and industry to the river town she served as chief executive. Wetumpka's first female mayor, she was so well regarded that she was re-elected by a 4-1 margin this year.

Jeanette Barrett, the kind of public servant who makes a difference in government, will be remembered fondly by those officials with whom, and those citizens for whom, she worked.

FRIENDS, FAMILY REMEMBER BARRETT

(By Laurie Wood)

WETUMPKA.—Hundreds of relatives, friends, co-workers and Alabama officials gathered Wednesday afternoon to remember Jeanette Edwards Barrett, Wetumpka's first female mayor, as a dedicated woman who loved her family and friends and spent her last years striving for what she believed was best for her city.

Mrs. Barrett, 65 died Monday night at Baptist Medical Center after battling cancer for several years. She was re-elected in August to a second term as mayor.

Services were held at the First Baptist Church were Mrs. Barrett was a member for some 30 years. The Rev. James Sexton, pastor of the church officiated.

He asked the congregation to recall personal memories of Mrs. Barrett.

He remembered her as a virtuous woman who loved her family and the city of Wetumpka and who could be strong-willed in her beliefs but wanted only the best for her city.

Lining the church rail were flowers shaped in the insignia of the Wetumpka Volunteer Fire Department placed by members, along with a "badge" of flowers from the Wetumpka Police Department and a floral arrangement presenting Wetumpka's coat of arms from city employees and officials.

City department heads served as pallbearers and the five city councilmen were honorary pallbearers.

Among those who packed the sanctuary were Tuskegee Mayor Johnny Ford. Uniformed members of the Wetumpka Police Department attended the service, as did several Alabama State Troopers and state game wardens, Members of the Wetumpka volunteer Fire Department, Millbrook Police Chief Don Buzbee and Chief Eddie Tullis of the Poarch Band of Creek Indians also were present.

State troopers and Wetumpka police led the funeral procession to Mount Hebron West cemetery in the Elmore community, where Mrs. Barrett was buried.

The Wetumpka City Council will meet at 4:30 p.m. today to appoint a new mayor to finish Mrs. Barrett's four-year term.

WETUMPKA TO APPOINT NEW MAYOR

(By Laurie Wood)

The Wetumpka City Council will meet later this week to appoint a new mayor to finish the unexpired four-year term of Jeanette E. Barrett. Mrs. Barrett, 65, died Monday night, slightly more than three months after she was elected to a second term.

Traditionally, a new mayor is appointed from among the five city council members. But a private citizen with no political connections could be selected as long as he or she has lived within the city limits for 90 days, a city councilman said.

A time and date for the meeting had not been announced Tuesday.

If Mayor Pro Tempore Marion Sanford, who is serving as acting mayor, is named mayor, another mayor pro tempore will be selected from the remaining four councilmembers. If named mayor, Mr. Sanford cannot vote for the new mayor pro tempore.

The appointment of a new mayor pro tempore would come at the next scheduled council meeting, which will be Monday at 7 p.m.

If one of the other four councilmembers is named mayor, the council will appoint someone at a later time from the chosen councilmember's district to fill the vacant council seat, said Jack Wood, councilman for District 4.

The mayoral appointment does not require unanimous approval of the council.

No special elections will be held to decide the new mayor or a replacement councilmember, city officials said.

Early this year, Bill Sahlie was appointed to fill the vacancy created when Dick Landers moved outside the city limits and was disqualified from holding a council seat. In September 1986, former Councilwoman Blanton Noland, who did not run for re-election this year, was named to fill her husband's council seat following his death.

Mrs. Barrett's funeral will be held at 2 p.m. today at Wetumpka's First Baptist Church with the Rev. James Sexton officiating. Burial will follow a Mount Hebron West cemetery.

Wetumpka City Hall will be closed from noon today until 8 a.m. Thursday. Black funeral bows were placed on the front doors of the building Tuesday, and the United States flag was lowered to half-mast in Mrs. Barrett's honor.

All activities at Saturday's Christmas on the Coosa celebration will be dedicated to Mrs. Barrett, said Alma Leak, chairwoman of the Christmas on the Coosa committee. Mrs. Barrett originated the idea for the annual event, now in its fifth year. It drew an estimated 30,000 visitors to the city last year.

REMARKS OF SENATOR KASTEN ON PROSPECTS FOR CONTINUED ECONOMIC GROWTH

Mr. MACK. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senate a recent speech by my good friend and colleague Senator BOB KASTEN on the prospects for continued economic growth.

I share Senator KASTEN's optimistic view of our Nation's economic future. There is absolutely no reason for this economic expansion to end—unless the Federal Government puts it to an end with misguided policies like a tax increase and high interest rate monetary policy.

Congress must face up to the fact that tax increases don't come free of charge. Tax increases impose real costs on our economy that can be measured in lost jobs, lost growth, lost productivity, and lost opportunities. The Federal Reserve should realize what is obvious to most American families: economic growth and job creation is good for America. Putting more Americans to work does not cause inflation. Thus, the Fed should stop encouraging the rise in short-term interest rates.

Mr. President, we must avoid this demand-side, Keynesian policy retreat and advance a progrowth, supply-side policy offensive. I believe that the most important way that we can spur economic growth is to cut the capital gains tax rate. In his speech, Senator KASTEN proposes an innovative approach that he hopes will serve as a good legislative vehicle to accomplish the goal of bringing down the capital gains rate.

I ask unanimous consent that Senator KASTEN's speech to the Citizens for a Sound Economy Conference be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS: CITIZENS FOR A SOUND ECONOMY

(By Sen. Robert W. Kasten, Jr., January 25, 1989)

Thank you very much. It's good to be among friends—among men and women who understand that a sound, job-creating economy ought to be the number one priority on America's political agenda.

If you believe the so-called "conventional wisdom" in this town, you'd think that jobs don't really matter, that economic growth isn't really important. You'd actually come to believe that the well-being of the American economy, and the integrity of our national spirit, depended on one key factor: the elimination at all costs of the Federal budget deficit.

Now, I'm not about to tell you that the budget deficit doesn't matter, or that we can safely ignore it without eventual peril to our productive economy. But what I will tell you—and I'm sure Phil Gramm and Richard Rahn have already touched on this point—is that our budget is on the road to balance as long as we don't decide to raise taxes.

One of the easiest ways we can avoid bringing this budget into balance in the next few years is by choking off our revenues at the source. And the way to do that, of course, is by saying "Damn the torpedoes, let's raise taxes!"—and never mind the consequences.

The basic mistake of the tax increase proponents has been their assumption that tax increases somehow come free of charge. Many of them believe that a taxpayer dollar languishing in someone's pocket has no higher calling than to help reduce Washington's deficit.

But the plain truth is that each extra dollar that is diverted away from the productive economy and toward the public sector comes at a terrible cost—a cost we can measure in lost growth, lost jobs, lost productivity, and lost opportunities for many Americans who really need them.

What we ought to do—those of us who are concerned about the future of the American economy—is step back and look at the broad canvas of that economy, define our goals for it, and work on approaches that will make sure those goals are achieved.

The economy can be compared to a large machine that produces goods and services. How it treats us—and especially the most economically needy among us—depends entirely on how we treat it.

The basic question we should be asking ourselves is, What kind of a nation are we?

Do we prize the most creative and innovative people, the investors and the savers, the ones who create our nation's stock of wealth? Or are we afraid of what happens when men and women are free to create and produce to the limits of their potential?

To the extent that we Americans have succeeded in creating a good life for our people, and in establishing a just and happy social order—we have succeeded because we have had a truly free economy: free to produce, free to create, and free to open up ladders of opportunity to ever-expanding circles of citizens.

We really ought to stop concentrating so much on issues like the budget deficit, and start listening to the voices of the real economy—the voice of the entrepreneur trying to start a new business; the voice of the small business woman looking for a decent interest rate; the voice of a young parent trying to save for a child's education; the voice of the factory worker struggling to compete in a high-tech economy.

What these voices are saying is, we have real needs—needs upon which the future of America depends. They are saying, if you in Washington continue to suffer from a kind of "tunnel vision" obsession about the deficit, we're not going to be able to meet some real threats and challenges.

The chief danger, I think, in being deficit-obsessed is that many widely-hailed "solutions" to the deficit focus our attention on the demand side of the economy just when we ought to be concentrating on the supply side. The demand-side, Keynesian policy proposals—like high taxes and high interest rates—are hindrances to the real-life voices of the supply-side economy. In tending toward recession, they threaten the very roots of our national well-being.

The Federal Reserve Board should admit once and for all that "Growth is Good." Putting more people back to work does not cause higher inflation. In this decade, we've seen the abolition of the Phillips Curve trade-off between inflation and unemployment, because both have fallen simultaneously. The Fed's almost perverse attitude on this subject only serves to prop up short-term interest rates—making it even more difficult to bring down the deficit.

Comments by Fed officials to the effect that interest rates cannot come down until Congress brings down the deficit are equally unhelpful. As long as the conventional wisdom refuses to admit that tax revenues are growing, any plea for deficit reduction is automatically transformed by the financial markets into a tax-increase ultimatum.

It is wrong—just plain wrong—to hold America's monetary policy hostage to a tax increase. The Fed should pursue its monetary policy independent of Congress' fiscal policy.

Unless the Fed reverses its policy of encouraging the rise of short-term interest rates, we may be in danger of recession by the end of the coming year. I can't stress this strongly enough. I'm optimistic about the economy and its overall strength and resiliency—but believe you me, there won't be much give left if the Fed keeps on raising short-term rates.

Congress ought to be paying a lot more attention to the things we can do to promote productivity growth. Enhancing the nation's productivity—the output per man hour—is the major challenge that we face in the 1990s. It's the key to higher living standards, international competitiveness, job opportunities—and even deficit reduction.

The most important way that Congress can boost our nation's productivity is by reducing the tax rate on capital gains. Earlier today, I introduced a bill in the Senate called the Entrepreneurship and Productivity Growth Act—a bill which offers a new approach to capital gains reform.

The bill also serves as a solution to the partisan impasse forming over President Bush's proposal to cut the tax rate on capital gains to 15 percent—and I hope this bill will help bring the issue of capital gains to the forefront of the economic debate, where it belongs.

The bill contains three major elements. First, it reduces the tax rate on capital gains. Under this bill, assets held for more than twelve months would be eligible for a 50-percent exclusion from ordinary income—effectively reducing the tax rate on those gains to 14 percent for taxpayers in the 28-percent bracket, and to 7.5 percent for those in the 15-percent bracket.

Second, it targets the new incentive to equity investment. The capital gains differential would only apply to investment in equities—direct investment in stock and purchases of stock sold by other investors. Sellers of collectibles and real property would not benefit from the exclusion.

Third, the bill indexes capital gains for inflation. For years in which inflation exceeds four percent, the capital gains would be indexed using the GNP deflator. Inflation would be measured from the time the assets are purchased until the time they are sold.

This bill seeks to restore the focus of economic policy back to the supply side. Lower capital gains rates are the spark of business innovation, technological advancement, job creation and GNP growth. What we do to promote the realization of lower capital gains rate is a useful indicator of the kind of society we are: How important is it to us to promote investment in our productive potential, in our economic future?

We can't honestly declare ourselves to be committed to economic growth if we remain unwilling to promote savings and investment in this way. Our chief trading partners realize how helpful it is to keep capital gains taxes low—most of them actually have a zero percent capital gains rate.

If we bring our effective rate down to 14 percent, we'll be increasing the availability of start-up capital for the high-risk, growth-oriented small businesses that account for so much of our economy's job creation. We would restore the interest of our financial markets in long-term equity investment, and correspondingly take it away from short-term gains—like those available through investment in junk bonds and commodity options.

Our economy has great resources. Cutting the capital gains rate will free those resources up by increasing the mobility—and therefore the efficiency—of capital. When capital starts to flow from existing companies to new companies and growing businesses, we'll be able to measure the result in job creation and increased productivity.

Indexing is a very important element of this bill. I think it's fundamentally unjust to tax holders of capital assets—like homes, land, and family farms—on purely inflationary gains. Many liberal economists, including Joseph Pechman and Alan Blinder, support indexing of capital gains.

Some of my Democrat colleagues, however, are concerned that indexing would be a revenue loser. But under CBO's projected inflation rates for the next five years, there will be virtually no static revenue loss from this provision.

It might then be asked, What is the point of indexing above 4 percent when inflation doesn't reach that high?

The answer is simple. We want to start off with a four percent trigger to address concerns about potential static revenue loss from full indexing. Then, as the economy booms thanks to the new capital gains differential, we hope to reduce and eventually eliminate the inflation trigger.

President Bush won last November's election on the issue of taxes. He said we should bring down the capital gains rate to 15 percent. I think that the bill I'm proposing will prove a good legislative vehicle to accomplish this goal, because it addresses a number of concerns our Democrat friends have about certain aspects of an across-the-board capital gains cut.

In 1987, I introduced a bill to cut the capital gains tax to 15 percent. A number of my Senate colleagues objected. They said, "Bob, we want to promote economic growth just as much as you do. But this bill doesn't do that—it declares open season for tax shelters all over again, and tells people to start hiding all their money in paintings and gold coins again."

They were right, at least about one thing. Congress ought to be in the business of promoting high-risk, growth-oriented investment, not tax shelters and collectibles trading. That's why I've restricted the capital gains differential in my new bill to investment in equities—equities that promote productivity and GNP growth.

And this rising GNP growth means higher tax revenues for the Federal government. Even CBO admits—and this is a quote—that "lower tax rates on gains could increase savings and capital formation, and channel more resources into venture capital." What CBO failed to recognize, though, is that this increased capital formation, and especially new investment in venture capital, means that the entire tax base will grow even faster—and boost overall revenues.

I want to convince the Bush Administration to make this new approach to capital gains a major priority of its first hundred days. Let's remember the optimism and dedication to the future that have marked us for centuries as Americans—and work together to promote this and other new departures for a growing economy.

I look forward to working with you to advance these legislative proposals. Thank you.

VENTURE CAPITAL GAINS ACT

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing legislation to provide a modest tax incentive in favor of high-risk long-term investments in America's future.

It has never been clearer that Americans need to fight for our economic prosperity and independence. We find ourselves in an international competition of great intensity and we are losing on many fronts.

There is a developing consensus that American investors and businessmen focus too much on short-term gains in income and neglect long-term investments in economic growth. The values that are associated with the stereotype of a yuppie and infecting our business community and our economic prosperity as a nation will suffer as a result.

Today we underinvest in new business ventures, in research and development, in plant and equipment, and in training. When we underinvest, we put our future at risk, we live for the moment, and we ignore the piper's song.

Increasingly we rely on financial wizards and lawyers to camouflage the fact that our economic foundations are eroding.

The legislation I reintroduce today addresses this issue by giving investors an incentive to become venture capitalists, to take risks, to invest for the long-term, and to seek the gains which come from economic growth.

My legislation will encourage investors to take risks on new ideas and new technologies, to give entrepreneurs the capital they need to fund the business ventures of tomorrow, and to wait for long-term gain on these investments.

I am delighted that Senators DECONCINI, DIXON, GORE, INOUYE, SANFORD, DASCHLE, HEFLIN, SASSER, DODD, KERRY, BURDICK, and BOSCHWITZ have agreed to be original cosponsors of this legislation. I hope to have more cosponsors as the capital gains debate becomes more focused.

It is clear from this list of cosponsors that the capital gains issue is a bipartisan issue in the Congress. Senate Democrats are just as interested in the capital gains issue as are Republicans. Senate Democrats want to debate the capital gains issue on the merits and to join in fashioning a reasonable and effective incentive for capital formation.

I look forward to working with my cosponsors and with the members of the Senate Finance Committee on the capital gains issue.

HISTORY OF VENTURE CAPITAL GAINS LEGISLATION

While we were considering the Tax Reform legislation in 1986 I expressed my concern about the repeal of the capital gains tax preference. My concern then and my concern now is that small business ventures would suffer most if the capital gains preference was repealed and this has proven to be true.

During consideration of the tax reform law, the Small Business Committee held a hearing on this issue and we heard from many experts about the adverse consequences of repealing the capital gains tax. ("The Elimination of the Capital Gains Differential for Individuals and Its Impact on Small Business Capital Formation," hearings before the Senate Small Business Committee, June 4, 1986.) We heard from venture capitalists who warned that repealing the capital gains preference would reduce the inclination of investors to make high-risk, long-term, growth-oriented investments.

The witnesses said that the problem with the tax reform law would be that it would place a premium on low-risk, short-term, income-producing investments. With the elimination of the capital gains tax preference, there would no longer be any reason for a taxpayer to hold onto an investment even for 6 months, the old holding period required for capital gains investments.

Of course, the Congress ignored these warnings, adopted the tax reform law, and the capital gains tax preference was eliminated.

To remedy the flaw in the tax reform law, in April of 1987 I introduced S. 931, the Small Business Capital Formation Act of 1987. (133 Congressional Record S4728-4732, April 7, 1987.) The bill I introduce today is the same bill, with some minor technical refinements.

VENTURE CAPITAL GAINS COMPARED TO PRESIDENT'S CAMPAIGN PROPOSAL

I introduced S. 931 long before then-Vice President George Bush advanced his own capital gains proposal. We are now awaiting the details on his proposal, which may differ from the capital gains proposal he described during the campaign. But it is helpful in describing the bill I am introducing today to compare it to the capital gains proposal the President advocated during the campaign.

TERMS OF CAPITAL GAINS PROPOSALS

The President and I agree on one point about capital gains taxes. We agree that the repeal of the capital gains tax preference in the tax reform law was ill-considered. But there are then many differences in our approaches to restoring a capital gains preference.

The President's capital gains proposal, as described during the campaign, is sweeping.

First, he proposed during the campaign that the maximum tax rate on capital gains income be reduced from 33 to 15 percent. This is a 55-percent reduction in the maximum tax rate. This makes the 25-percent "supply side" tax cut cut in 1981 look modest by comparison.

Second, this dramatic tax break apparently would be available for the sale or exchange of any capital asset.

The term "capital asset" is a term of art in the tax law, but it includes virtually everything—type of property you own and use for personal purposes or investment.

It includes corporate stock, commodities and futures contracts, shares in a partnership, a dwelling owned and occupied by you and your family, household furnishings, a car used for pleasure purposes and commuting, coin or stamp collections, gems and jewelry, gold, silver, and any other metal.

It includes property used in trade or business, an invention, good will, a franchise, trademark or trade name, livestock, and timber, domestic iron ore and coal may all be capital assets.

I have commissioned a memorandum from the Congressional Research Service which outlines the range of assets which qualify as capital assets and is an expansive list. (Memorandum of Greg Esenwein, CRS, August 3, 1988.) When you review the list, in many cases it becomes difficult to justify providing preferential tax benefits. It is incumbent on any advocate for preferential tax treatment to explain why it is in the national interest to reduce the tax burden for taxpayers who make certain investments and I do not think that this is possible for investments in many of the assets which qualify as capital assets.

Third, the President indicated during the campaign that to qualify for capital gains tax treatment, the investment would have to be held for 1 year. On January 1, 1988, the holding period on capital gains reverted from 6 months to 1 year and the President would not propose that the 6-month holding period previously in effect be restored.

The 1-year holding period is hardly enough to encourage the patient capital that American firms need to grow and prosper. It's better than a zero holding period, but it's hardly enough to encourage long-term, high-risk investments in America's future.

Finally, it is not clear whether the President intends for the alternative minimum tax [AMT] to apply. The AMT would not apply unless the tax law is amended to include capital gains in the list of preference items. Indirect sources indicate that Bush would not apply the AMT to the new capital gains preference, but no decision on this issue apparently has been made.

This means that high income taxpayers would claim capital gains income and avoid paying their fair share in taxes. The minimum tax is one of the most important reforms of the tax reform law and the President's campaign proposal would undermine its application and effectiveness.

My capital gains bill—S. 931—and the bill I am introducing today propose a much narrower capital gains tax preference, one that is targeted at high-risk, long-term, growth-oriented investments.

First, I propose that the maximum tax rate on capital gains income be 21 percent. This represents a 36-percent reduction in the tax rates which apply to capital gains.

Second, this tax break would be available only for investments in corporate stock. It is not available for investments in any other capital asset.

Third, these investments in corporate stock must be direct investments in corporate stock; that is, purchases of stock directly from the corporation as distinct from purchases of stock sold by another investor, trading in the secondary market.

Fourth, the stock must have been issued by a small business with less than $100 million in paid-in capital. I will discuss this limitation further in a minute.

Fifth, the stock which is purchased must be held for a minimum of 4 years.

And finally, any gain on the stock is explicitly included as a preference item in the alternative minimum tax.

S. 931 and the bill I introduce today are directed at the investments typically made by entrepreneurs and venture capitalists. These are risky, long-term investments in startup ventures. These are the investments which entrepreneurs make when they start a new business. These are the investments which venture capitalists make when they back an entrepreneur with seed capital.

I made this point at some length when the Senate debated the amendment offered by Senator ARMSTRONG to the Senate budget resolution on April 14, 1988. I argued then against indexing the basis for capital assets and in favor of a targeted capital gains exclusion. I emphasized then that capital gains should be for entrepreneurs. (133 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 6847-6848, April 14, 1988.)

The President's capital gains incentive is available for much less risky, much shorter-term investments in a wide variety of assets which have nothing to do with growth or job creation or the competitiveness of U.S. industries.

Why should we encourage investments in vacation homes or antique cars? I see no public policy rationale for a capital gains tax preference for either type of investment.

My bill is fairer to middle-income taxpayers. It limits the benefits which wealthy taxpayers can reap from the preference and the President's proposal does not.

The differences between the President's campaign proposal and my own are fundamental. They go to the question of what type of investments we should encourage. They concern the value of the incentive we should provide and who should receive the incentive.

These differences are issues of policy, but they are also issues which go to our values and priorities.

COMPARISON OF REVENUE IMPACT

Any consideration of a capital gains tax preference must focus first on the potential impact of such a preference on Government revenue. The merits of the issue are not open for serious debate if the revenue impact is severe.

The President's campaign proposal: President Bush asserted many times during the campaign that his proposal "would not cost the Government money." Rather, "it would gain additional revenue by stimulating growth." He repeated this claim at his first press conference last week. He states that this assertion is substantiated by the effect of the 1978 reduction in tax rates on capital gains—the Hansen-Steiger amendment—and by the research of Prof. Martin Feldstein and NBER researcher Lawrence Lindsey.

The Joint Committee on Taxation, however, has ruled in a response to an inquiry from Congressman BILL ARCHER that a 15-percent tax rate on capital gains would reduce Government revenue by $8.5 billion in 1990, $15 billion in 1991, and $17.1 billion in 1992. (Letter of David Brockway to Congressman ARCHER of November 8, 1987). The total 3-year revenue loss is projected to be $40.6 billion.

Similarly, the Congressional Budget Office has stated that a 15-percent rate would probably reduce Government revenue by between $3.9 and $7.8 billion per year.

Finally, a recent Congressional Research Service report indicates that instituting a capital gains tax preference may have a negative impact on Government revenue in the long run even if it has a positive impact in the short term.

In January 1987 the Treasury Department estimated that the increase in the capital gains tax rate in the tax reform legislation (from 20 percent to 28-33 percent) would increase Government revenue by $21.8 billion over 5 years. The Federal Government already has received a $10 to $15 billion revenue bonus at the end of 1986 when taxpayers rushed to sell assets to take advantage of the then-still-applicable 20 percent maximum capital gains tax rate.

All of these estimates are controversial. There are more recent studies by the Treasury Department which indicate that some of the methodology in its earlier studies are not appropriate. These recent studies have been attacked by critics of the capital gains exclusion.

I am not sure that the revenue loss estimates of the Joint Committee and Treasury Department are accurate. Indeed, I am not even sure that they are reasonable. But, I do know several things.

These estimates seem to have been prepared in good faith by professionals. There is broad agreement among the Government officials who are preparing estimates.

Most important, these estimates are not static estimates. In each case, they find that a reduction in capital gains tax rates does encourage investors in capital assets to sell their assets, generating taxable income. They do not find that this increase in asset sales—in tax parlance these sales are referred to as "realizations"—are as great as others would find. They find that the rate of realizations increases, but they do not find that the increased rate is enough to offset the loss in revenue due to a lower tax rate.

Whether or not one agrees with its estimates, it is clear that the Joint Committee would find that the President's campaign proposal would lose many billions of dollars in revenue, perhaps tens of billions of revenue, if enacted into law. The Joint Committee does not accept the arguments of Mr. Feldstein or Mr. Lindsey.

More interesting, the Treasury Department of the Reagan-Bush administration still does not agree with the President's conclusion. As I have said, the Department is reviewing its position but it has not as yet changed its position.

There is good reason for all of us to be skeptical of any proposal which argues that a reduction in tax rates leads to an increase in revenue.

The 1981 "supply side" tax cut also was supposed to have a minimal impact on revenues because it was supposed to stimulate economic activity, but the official estimate of its impact on revenue—an estimate contained in President Reagan's own budget—is that it will reduce Government revenue by $290.9 billion this year alone.

Of course, whether or not one agrees with them, the revenue estimates of the Joint Committee are the only estimates used in the House and Senate and they alone determines whether the point of order under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law—as to whether a proposal is "deficit neutral"—applies.

This means that any proposal to reduce capital gains tax rates to 15 percent would have to be paid for by an equal amount of additional revenue from some other source or an equal amount of reductions in spending. The final result must not increase the deficit and the Joint Committee's determination on whether a proposal is deficit neutral is binding.

Revenue impact of venture capital gains bill: The revenue estimates for the President's campaign proposal contrast sharply with those for S. 931 and the bill I introduce today.

S. 931 differs from the bill I introduce today in that it would provide an incentive only for stock issued by companies with $10 million or less in paid-in capital. The venture capital gains bill would be available if the paid-in capital is less than $100 million. This makes very little difference in the revenue impact of the bill.

In 1987, I obtained an official revenue estimate from the Joint Committee on the revenue impact of S. 931. The Joint Committee finds that S. 931 would lose $24 million—that is million, not billion—in revenue in 1992, the first year after the 4-year holding period has run. Over a 3-year period it would lose $40 million. (Letter of Mr. David H. Brockway, September 18, 1987.)

This revenue estimate was so low that I asked the Joint Committee by how much the $10 million limitation in S. 931 could be raised—to apply the tax break to investments in larger businesses—while holding the revenue loss in 1992 to less than $500 million. The Joint Committee has told me that the $10 million limitation could be "removed altogether" and the revenue loss would be less than $500 million in 1992. The committee did not provide a specific revenue loss figure for the bill if the $10 million limitation is removed or raised to a given figure. (Letter of Mr. David H. Brockway, September 18, 1987.)

After obtaining this estimate, I consulted at length with representatives of the National Venture Capital Association and the National Small Business Investment Company Association to determine by how much we should raise the $10 million limitation. In these discussions I insisted that the aim must continue to be to target the capital gains break to smaller businesses because this is central to the concept of the bill. Based on these consultations, I have determined that the threshold should be raised from $10 to $100 million.

The venture capital gains bill remains identical to S. 931 on the other key issues, the 21-percent maximum rate, the limitation to direct investments, the 4-year holding period, and the application of the minimum tax. Each of these limitations is fundamental to the purpose and rationale of S. 931 and to the current bill.

So, with the $10 million limitation, S. 931 it lost one one-thousandth as much revenue as the President's campaign proposal, $40 million versus $40 billion. With the $100 million limitation, the venture capital gains bill loses one-eightieth as much revenue as the President's campaign proposal, $500 million versus $40 billion.

These revenue estimates on S. 931 and the current bill show that the 21-percent maximum rate, the limitation to direct investments, the limitation to purchases of stock, the 4-year holding period, and the application of the minimum tax are powerful constraints on the revenue loss for the bill.

They show that the 15-percent maximum rate, the absence of limitations on the type of investment, the 1-year holding period, and the exemption from the minimum tax are extremely generous and open the floodgates to lose Government revenue.

In terms of the budget deficit, the venture capital gains bill is responsible and the President's campaign proposal is not.

During the past 2 years I have suggested one way to finance the revenue loss which comes from enactment of my capital gains bill. On September 30, 1987, I wrote to the Members of the House Ways and Means and Senate Finance Committees stating that if the committees raised income tax rates for the 1987 reconciliation bill, there could well be enough revenue generated to adopt S. 931. If income tax rates were raised, it is likely that the committees would at least have retained the 33-percent maximum tax rate on capital gains. I suggested that the committees should move to lower capital gains tax rates along the lines suggested in S. 931.

Of course, the two committees chose not to raise income taxes rates so they never faced the issue of how to adjust capital gains tax rates.

We did debate this issue in late 1987 in the Senate when we debated the legislation to implement the deficit reduction agreement following the October stock market crash. During that debate Senator KASSEBAUM and I proposed an amendment which would have frozen most spending and frozen tax rates at their 1987 "transition" levels. This freeze on tax rates would have preserved the differential in tax rates between capital gains and ordinary income. The Kassebaum amendment was defeated.

This year we may again debate tax rates. The 33-percent recapture rate is an anomaly. High income individuals pay a top tax rate of 28 percent. Taxpayers with less income pay a top tax rate of 33 percent. In short, our tax system is regressive for high income individuals. This tax rate structure makes no sense. If we turn this 33-percent recapture tax rate into a flat bracket, we should focus on the capital gains issue.

WINDFALL VERSUS INCENTIVE

The capital gains tax is a tax incentive. Its purpose is to induce or encourage taxpayers to engage in certain behavior which we in the Congress believe is in the national interest. We should only provide a tax incentive to taxpayers if we believe that providing the incentive will induce or encourage taxpayers to engage in that behavior and if we believe that taxpayers would not otherwise engage in that behavior.

A tax incentive merely creates a windfall if it rewards taxpayers for doing that which they would do without the incentive. Of course, some taxpayers already make investments in capital assets or in the stock of startup small businesses and their investments would now be rewarded with a tax subsidy. For these investors the capital gains tax preference confers a windfall and is not responsible for encouraging these taxpayers to make these investments.

It is clear that the President's campaign proposal would confer a much greater windfall on taxpayers than would the venture capital gains bill. There is no capital gains tax preference now and millions and millions of investors are buying capital assets and holding them for a year. There are very few taxpayers who invest in startup small businesses and hold the investment for 4 years. This is part of the reason why the revenue loss for my bill is so much less than for the "15 percent solution."

We should not give away tax subsidies unless taxpayers have to work for them, to do something that is riskier with their investment dollars. The President's campaign proposal does not set high enough standards for the quid pro quo for the subsidy. The venture capital goods bill does.

I have requested that the Joint Committee on Taxation to attempt to determine the degree of windfall which is conferred by the President's campaign proposal and the venture capital gains bill. I am awaiting its report. I am not sure the Joint Committee has ever been asked to prepare such a report before but its report will be very interesting to review.

DIRECT INVESTMENTS VERSUS TRADING

"Capital formation" is the rallying cry for all those interested in providing tax incentives for investment.

The venture capital gains bill literally forms new capital in the sense that it applies only to the initial investments in new issues of stock issued by small companies. My bill puts new capital in the hands of entrepreneurs to use in founding or expanding a business. The capital is formed for the persons who need it, the entrepreneur.

The venture capital gains bill does not apply to the trading of a stock in the secondary market, which does not raise any additional capital for the company which issued the stock in the first place. Once a business has issued and sold its stock, it has obtained the capital it needs from the investors. No new capital is formed when stock is traded on the secondary market.

If trading of that stock increases the price of the stock, the business can obtain more capital when it issues additional stock. The business wants the stock price to rise so that it can raise more capital if it issues additional stock and so that an investor does not try to take over the company by buying a controlling share of the stock. But the immediate beneficiaries of stock trading in the secondary market are investors and brokerage houses, not the business whose stock is traded.

By providing a tax incentive only for direct investments in stock, the venture capital gains bill ensures that the business which issues the stock—and the entrepreneurs who run the business—should be able to obtain a higher price for the stock it issues. This means the business and the entrepreneurs will have more capital to work with in building the business.

This focus on direct investments may have a positive impact on initial public offerings of stock—and subsequent issues of stock by the businesses until the $100 million or other limitation comes into play. These initial public offerings are the riskiest undertakings for an entrepreneur, but going public is the only way many growth-oriented small businesses can raise the capital they need to grow.

The venture capital gains bill forms new capital and puts it in the hands of entrepreneurs. The President's campaign proposal forms very little new capital and mostly shifts it around among investors. My proposal rewards wise investments in smart entrepreneurs, while the President's rewards speculation about the value of existing stock.

STOCK PURCHASES VERSUS OTHER INVESTMENTS

The old capital gains tax preference applied to many types of investments other than investments in corporate stock, including many investments which have nothing to do with competitiveness or other macroeconomic issues. It applied to investments in vintage cars, antiques, gold coins, paintings, and gems. It also applied to investments in real estate.

The venture capital gains bill applies only to investments in corporate stock because small businesses rely on the equity market to obtain patient capital. Most small businesses cannot afford to pay the carrying costs on debt. As a matter of public policy, we should encourage growth in the equity markets, not the debt markets. This public policy explains the elimination of the tax deduction for consumer interest.

The venture capital gains bill focuses on investments which will help American compete in international trade. There is no rationale for encouraging investments in collectibles. Similarly, there is little need to encourage additional investments in real estate. Investments in seed capital for entrepreneurs is what is needed for American to be competitive.

REAL RISK OF INVESTMENT

The venture capital gains bill provides a tax break to investments in the stock of small businesses because there is real risk in these investments. Small businesses can and do fail. In fact, venture capitalists have a rule of thumb that only one or two of ten investments will pay off well in the long run.

Companies whose stock trades on the New York Stock Exchange rarely fail. They pay dividends regularly. The price of the stock may rise or fall, but an investor rarely risks losing everything he or she has invested.

Investors in the initial offering of stock take a particular risk because it is difficult to know how much the stock will sell for in the secondary market. The initial price of stock may bear little relationship to the value that other investors will place on that stock in the secondary market. The price of initial public offerings may rise or fall substantially the first day the stock is traded in the secondary market. In fact, there may be no secondary market for the stock because it is not possible to know how much the stock is worth.

Often investments in startup companies are made before the company has manufactured or marketed any products. The investments provide research funds for the company to discover a new product or to begin manufacturing that product. At this point in the life of the company, it is very difficult to know how profitable the company will be and it may be many years before it turns any profit at all. Startup companies must reinvest their income in further research, manufacturing facilities or mass marketing. This may delay their ability to pay out dividends.

This is why there is a need for a tax incentive to encourage these investments. These investments do involve real and substantial risk. These are investments which investors are reluctant to make, but these are investments which must be made if we are to compete in international markets.

ENTREPRENEURS AND EMPLOYEES

The venture capital gains bill applies to stock purchases by any investor, including the entrepreneur who founds a company and employees who have stock purchase plans. It does not simply apply to outside investors who purchase the stock.

It is a relatively simple matter for an entrepreneur to issue stock to himself. It may be more difficult to determine the market value of that stock than it is to determine the value of stock sold to outside investors and the burden is on the taxpayer to substantiate his or her claims about the basis value of the stock.

For many small businesses, the value of the companies they found is their principal source of retirement savings.

FOUR YEAR HOLDING PERIOD

The four year holding period ensures that investors do not expect that the small businesses in which they invest will quickly generate income. The venture capital gains bill rewards investors who seek long-term growth, not short-term returns. It seeks to lengthen the time-horizon of both the companies which issue the stock and the investors who buy it.

This four year holding period is another element of the risk which is rewarded by my bill. There is inherently less risk in a shorter term investment. The longer the taxpayer must hold the investment to gain the tax benefits, the greater are the risks which the taxpayer must take and the greater is the justification for the tax benefit.

The purpose of the venture capital gains bill is to encourage risk taking. The holding period involves risk, the emphasis on direct investment involves risk, and the limitation to the stock of small businesses involves risk.

ALTERNATIVE MINIMUM TAX

I have already said that the venture capital gains bill sets the maximum tax rate on capital gains at 21 percent and that the alternative minimum tax applies. These two provisions are directly related to one another.

The maximum tax rate of 21 percent on captial gains in S. 931 is the same as the tax rate under the minimum tax in the tax reform law. I considered setting a maximum tax rate of less than 21 percent, but it makes little sense to set the tax rate on capital gains lower than 21 percent if the minimum tax applies. If one sets a maximum tax rate on capital gains which is lower than 21 percent, the taxpayers who are subject to the minimum tax will still end up being taxed at the 21 percent rate under the minimum tax. It's a zero sum game for taxpayers who are subject to the minimum tax.

I have requested that the Joint Committee on Taxation analyze the relationship between a capital gains preference and the minimum tax. In a letter of June 26, 1988, Mr. Ron Pearlman of the joint committee has presented an exact formula which explains this relationship and in a letter of July 26 I have asked the joint committee to prepare an additional analysis of this issue.

No debate on the capital gains issue can avoid the minimum tax issue. It is inconceivable to me that Congress would restore a capital gains tax preference without applying the minimum tax. If I am correct in this judgment, it is hard to justify setting a maximum tax rate for capital gains of less than 21 percent.

PROGRESSIVITY AND FAIRNESS

The alternative minimum tax ensures that individuals cannot aggregate their tax preferences to reduce their marginal tax rate below 21 percent. This ensures that the venture capital gains bill will not undermine the progressivity and fairness of the tax system.

Many feel that the principal reason why the capital gains exclusion was repealed by the tax reform legislation was because a disproportionate amount of the benefits of the exclusion went to high income individuals. When the Congress moved to drastically reduce tax rates, limiting the tax applicable to very high income individuals to 28 percent, it had no choice but to limit the tax reduction opportunities provided to these high income individuals by such tax preferences as the capital gains exclusion.

The elimination of the capital gains exclusion served this purpose and so did the adoption of the alternative minimum tax. The tax reform law did not eliminate all tax preferences. There are still ways for high income taxpayers to reduce their tax liability. The minimum tax seeks to ensure that we will never again have reports of multimillionaires paying no taxes.

The venture capital gains bill explicitly includes the tax benefits of the capital gains tax break as a preference item in the minimum tax to ensure that the bill does not adversely affect the progresssivity of the tax system. It will not return us to the time when there were scandals about wealthy individuals avoiding paying any Federal income tax.

I have requested that the Joint Committee on Taxation study this issue in some detail. (Letter of May 12, 1988.) I have specifically asked the committee to analyze the distribution of benefits from the venture capital gains bill and from the President's campaign proposal. I am sure that this study will find that the benefits conferred by my bill are much more evenly distributed and are concentrated with the highest income taxpayers.

EFFECT OF CAPITAL GAINS REPEAL

There are many differences between the venture capital gains bill and the President's campaign proposal. But, let me repeat again that the President and I agree that the repeal of the capital gains tax law was bad policy.

It is not possible as yet to determine precisely how the increase in the capital gains tax rates has affected capital investments generally, but there is evidence that it has hurt capital formation for small businesses. The evidence is very hard to evaluate because there are so many conflicting forces at work. For example, there have been major nontax developments such as the stock market crash which have crippled markets for initial public offerings.

We do know that traditionally small businesses have had more difficulty obtaining capital because investments in small businesses involve more risk and have less prospects for generating short-term income. The reports of the Small Business Administration and others provide extensive data on this problem.

We know that the tax reform law exacerbates this problem by reducing the tax penalty on ordinary income by reducing marginal tax rates. This fact, together with the elimination of the capital gains holding period, may well reduce the attractiveness to investors of long-term, growth-oriented, riskier investments, particularly those in startup small businesses. It may increase the attractiveness of short-term, income-oriented, safer investments. If this is true, the tax reform bill will hurt investments in small businesses, which need to reinvest all of their net income in the business to help it grow and prosper.

There is anecdotal evidence that the tax reform law is hurting capital formation for small businesses. Venture magazine reported that "startups face trouble from venture capitalists, an imperiled SBIC program, and a higher capital gains tax." ("Desperate for Dollars," May 1988.) This article states that the problem arises from "simple arithmetic." "When venture capitalists can get a fairly safe 35 percent to 50 percent on a leveraged buyout, why accept a potential 50 percent on a startup that carries more risk?" One venture capitalist said that "venture capitalists aren't looking for seedlings, they're looking for 12-inch tree trunks."

It is too much to expect that those of us who propose a capital gains tax preference will ever be able to precisely quantify what the tax reform law means for capital formation for the country or for small business. But, we have strong evidence that it has exacerbated a problem which small businesses always have had in obtaining sufficient capital to grow and prosper.

THE CAPITAL GAINS DEBATE

There are some who will oppose any capital gains tax no matter how targeted it may be. They will argue that the tax reform law should not be changed, particularly by restoring one of the principal tax preferences. They will argue that the beauty of the tax reform law is that it simplifies the Tax Code, eliminating distortions. They will argue that restoring any tax preferences would require raising the low tax rates, which would undo the principal benefit of the tax reform law.

I respect these arguments. They are arguments about principles. These arguments are made by some of the most responsible Members of the Congress. These are arguments which must be addressed by those of us who support restoring a capital gains tax preference.

The venture capital gains bill does recreate a capital gains tax break and that is controversial no matter what the limitations are in the proposal. The tax break I propose is limited and targeted and it may be much more palatable than the President's campaign proposal, but it does reopen the debate on capital gains and it may even reopen the debate on the tax reform law.

Many tax reform advocates long opposed the capital gains tax break and hailed its repeal. Statistics cited during the tax reform debate showed that the benefits of the capital gains tax break had gone largely to wealthy individuals. In addition, the 6-month holding period was indefensible.

It can be said that any move to recreate any tax break for capital gains undermines the tax reform legislation. The venture capital gains bill can be seen as a foot in the door for a much broader proposal like that of the Vice President. Reform advocates may not think this to be wise.

The critics of the capital gains preference can ask why the President would favor special tax treatment for investments in collectibles and real estate, why he favors a large differential in tax rates, why he favors the break for nondirect investments, why he favors a short holding period, and why he favors exempting the gains from the minimum tax. And, most important, they will ask why he is so unconcerned about the revenue impact of an across-the-board capital gains tax preference.

My proposal challenges the assumptions about capital gains by showing that there is a moderate, targeted, fiscally responsible alternative to the old-style capital gains exclusion. The criticisms which can be made of the President's campaign proposal do not apply to the venture capital gains bill.

My proposal focuses on entrepreneurs, employees of startup businesses, and venture capitalists—not on takeover artists, arbitragers, and margin accounts. It focuses on investments in businesses that might actually fail, not on trading of IBM stock. It provides capital to small businesses, which have been shown to be the principal source of new employment and innovation. It focuses on the future, not on the short term. It would not adversely affect the progressivity of the tax system.

If there is any rationale for restoring a capital gains tax incentive, and I think there is, the venture capital gains bill is the approach we should take.

It is the only fiscally responsible capital gains proposal being considered in the Congress.

It rewards real risk taking in growth-oriented small businesses.

It offsets the bias toward low-risk, income-oriented investments in the tax reform legislation.

It gives a preference only to investments which have a bearing on the competitiveness of the country.

It literally forms new capital, rather than simply encouraging trading of existing capital.

And it is fair to the middle income taxpayer.

These features of the venture capital gains bill do not meet every argument which the defenders of the tax reform law may raise. They want no changes in the tax reform law. They view it as a holy document. They see a problem with any changes because they fear that this will lead to a flood of changes.

When the arguments turn to the merits of the issue, the venture capital gains bill is a capital gains proposal which makes sense. It takes the debate on capital gains back to the basics, long-term risktaking.

I have great respect for the authors of the tax reform law. I did not agree with the repeal of the capital gains incentive, but I understand why it happened. I do not think that the tax reform law is perfect and cannot be improved. I look forward to debating the venture capital gains bill on the merits.

POLITICAL REALITY ON CAPITAL GAINS

I fear that the President's campaign proposal gives the opponents of a capital gains tax preference too many arguments.

His proposal is so lacking in focus, so indiscriminate and so irresponsible in its potential revenue impact, it discredits our efforts to debate this issue.

Two years after we have completely abolished the capital gains preference is too soon for anyone to be arguing that we should completely reverse course. This is shortsighted and politically unrealistic. Congress does not often completely reverse itself on any issue and it rarely does one on an issue which was thoroughly debated the first time.

The President apparently has learned nothing from the tax reform debate. One would think that he did not support the President's tax reform initiative. He does not see any legitimacy in the criticisms which were raised about the old capital gains tax. He wants to return to the old capital gains tax preference, with no changes, no rethinking of the issues, and no new concepts.

The President's campaign proposal makes it easy for the opponents of the capital gains tax preference. In fact, I believe that the President's proposal will delay the time when we will have a full-blown debate on the capital gains issue. It is too easy to defeat the President's proposal on a point of order. It is too easy to ridicule it. It is too hard to explain why we are providing an incentive for investments in vacation homes and antique cars.

There are some who will be beguilded with the President's campaign proposal. It's both flashy and simple. It promises a return to the good old days. It promises the combined benefits of the low tax reform rates and the old tax preferences. It promises that you can have it all.

The politics of this issue may turn out to be quite strange. I would think that the representatives of the securities industry would oppose the President's proposal because it restores the 1-year holding period. It prospers when investors trade stock, not when investors hold it. It fought for the 6-month holding period and it loves the zero holding period even more.

There are, however, investors who specialize in making long-term, high-risk investments, the venture capitalists. They know that the entrepreneurs they back cannot pay out any dividends. They know that some of these ventures fail. They know that the secondary market for their investments is weak. But, they take the risk because there can be tremendous rewards.

The natural constituency for the venture capital gains bill is the venture capital industry. In fashioning this bill I have worked closely with the National Venture Capital Association and the National Small Business Investment Company Association. These asociations can understand the rationale for a long holding period and for rewarding high-risk investments.

In fact, I woud argue that it is in the interest of the venture capitalist to oppose the President's campaign proposal. If the President's proposal were to be adopted—which I think is exceedingly unlikely—the primary beneficiary will be the securities industry, which specializes in shorter term, lower risk investments. The 1 year holding period will lead investors away from longer term, higher risk investments. It is even possible that the pool of venture capital investors may shrink. The President's proposal may discourage longer term, higher risk investments.

The tax reform law did eliminate many tax preferences. It did deregulate the tax system. This means that whatever tax incentives are left are even more powerful. There aren't many tax incentives left and those which remain are all the more attractive. If the President's campaign proposal were to be adopted, it will be the dominant tax issues for all investments. And, it is not focused on the type of investments made by venture capitalists.

On the other hand, if the venture capital gains bill is adopted, it will provide a powerful incentive that is tailor made for venture capital investments. If it is adopted, the pool of venture capital may increase. There will be an incentive for longer term, higher risk investments and perhaps a slight disincentive for shorter term, lower risk investment.

Indeed, the President's campaign proposal and the venture capital gains bill may have opposite effects. One helps the securities industry and one helps the venture capital industry. It is clear to me that these two industries cannot agree on one approach to the capital gains issue. Their interests are inconsistent. That's just a statement of fact. And the sooner the venture capital industry realizes this fact, and takes the lead on the capital gains issue, the sooner we can amend the tax reform law.

I am proposing that we reform the old capital gains tax to meet the legitimate objections which were raised to it during the tax reform debate. The venture capital gains bill takes the debate on capital gains back to its roots. It avoids ideology, it avoids supply-side magic, and it forces the opponents of the capital gains tax preference to debate real issues.

In any event, the revenue impact of the President's campaign proposal is so severe, it is quite unlikely that it can be pursued next year or at any time in the foreseeable future. Next year we are facing a drastic and mandatory reduction in the deficit under the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings law. We may have to cut $40 or more from the fiscal 1990 deficit. It is inconceivable that the Congress can seriously consider a proposal which is estimated to increase the deficit by tens of billions of dollars.

It will also be difficult to consider the venture capital gains bill this year, but, it will not be impossible to consider it. It does lose revenue, but this year the Congress may well enact a significant tax increase. If that tax increase involves tinkering with tax rates, particularly the 33 percent recapture bracket, it is quite possible that Congress will balance this move by reducing the maximum capital gains tax rate to 28 percent or even reduce it along the lines suggested in my bill. So, there is a plausible scenario for considering my bill this year and there is no plausible scenario for considering the President's campaign proposal.

For these reasons I must oppose the President's campaign proposal on capital gains. That proposal is counterproductive to the goal of encouraging long-term, high-risk investments. It delays the day when we can focus on a reasonable, responsible and realistic capital gains proposal. It is not a realistic option in the current budget climate.

If our only choice is between the President's campaign proposal and nothing, I would have to prefer no change in the current law. And it is in the interest of the venture capital industry to take the same position.

But, that is not the choice. We can restore a capital gains preference which is fiscally responsible, which will generate economic growth and jobs, which complements the tax reform legislation, and which is tailor made for the venture capital industry.

I am convinced that the venture capital gains bill is a solid, practical and reasonable proposal. It is, in fact, the only realistic option which has been proposed to restore the capital gains tax preference.

I ask unanimous consent that a table summarizing the differences between my capital gains proposal and that of the President during the campaign be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPARISON OF CAPITAL GAINS PROPOSALS

By Mr. HEFLIN:

S. 351. A bill to urge negotiations with the Government of France for the recovery and return to the United States of the C.S.S. Alabama; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

S. 352. A bill to urge negotiations with the Government of Mexico for the preservation and study of the wreck of the U.S.S. Somers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

"C.S.S. ALABAMA" AND "U.S.S. SOMERS"

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President. I rise today to introduce two bills which will preserve American history. One of these bills pertains to the Confederate States Steamer [C.S.S.] Alabama and the other pertains to the United States Steamer [U.S.S.] Somers. Both of these ships currently lie on the ocean floor in non-U.S. waters. The C.S.S. Alabama lies off of the coast of France and the U.S.S. Somers sits in the territorial waters of Mexico.

For many months now, the State Department has been negotiating with the Governments of France and Mexico to obtain permission to recover these ships and their artifacts for historical display. Throughout these negotiations, our Government has maintained that title to these ships and their artifacts is vested in and has never been abandoned by the United States. This view has, however, been disputed by foreign governments and the negotiations have been long, laborious and sometimes unsuccessful.

At present, with respect to the C.S.S. Alabama, I understand that a tentative agreement has been reached to form a tripartite commission from the United States, France, and Great Britain to oversee the recovery and disposition of her artifacts.

In the case of the U.S.S. Somers, less agreement has been reached, although I understand that the Mexican Government has agreed to allow the United States to recover any of her military dead who went down with the vessel.

To ensure that other nations understand our country's intent to recovery as much of these vessels and their artifacts as possible, I introduce these bills. These ships have important historical significance to my home State of Alabama and to the Nation as a whole. I implore the Foreign Relations Committee to hold hearings on these bills as expeditiously as possible and I urge my fellow Senators to support their passage. I also ask unanimous consent that a brief history of each of these illustrious vessels follow my remarks.

THE "C.S.S. ALABAMA"

On August 24, 1862, Capt. Raphael Semmes, commissioned the Confederate States Steamer, the C.S.S. Alabama, under the direct orders of Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederacy. During the next 2 years, the C.S.S. Alabama acquired the reputation as the most feared of all Confederate warships. She captured and burned 55 Union merchant ships and she bonded 10 others. No other Confederate raider matched her record which is detailed in the reports of Commander Semmes to the Secretary of the Navy. In one of these such reports, Commander Semmes recounted his battle with the U.S.S. Hatteras which he describes in the following words:

> We now hailed in turn to know who the enemy was, and when he had received the reply that he was the U.S.S. Hatteras we again hailed him and informed him that we were the C.S.S. Alabama, and at the same time I directed the first lieutenant to open fire upon him. Our fire was promptly returned, and a brisk action ensued, which lasted, however, only thirteen minutes, as at the end of that time the enemy fired an off gun and showed a light, and upon being hailed by us to know if he had surrendered, he replied that he had and that he was in a sinking condition. I immediately dispatched boats to his assistance, and had just time to remove the crew when the ship went down * * *. We received a few shot holes from the enemy, doing no material damage. The enemy's steamer Brooklyn and another steamer steamed out in pursuit of us soon after the action commenced, but missed us in the darkness of the night.

Many were the times that the C.S.S. Alabama destroyed another ship and then disappeared into the darkness of the night without sustaining any significant damage. Along with the report of the battle with the U.S.S. Hatteras, Commander Semmes included a list of the enemy's ships which he had burned, bonded and destroyed. The total value of vessels which the C.S.S. Alabama had disposed of as of May 1863 was $3,100,000. The total number of prisoners paroled as of that date was 795. During the short period from January 25 to May 10, 1863, the C.S.S. Alabama captured, burned, or bonded a total of 20 vessels.

The C.S.S. Alabama's illustrious record was arrested, however, on June 19, 1864 in the naval Battle of Cherbourg, one of the most dramatic events of the War Between the States.

After many exhausting months at sea, Capt. Raphael Semmes planned to relinquish command of the C.S.S. Alabama at Cherbourg Harbor in France and have the ship's hull, rigging, and engines overhauled. But, on June 14, 1864, before Semmes could obtain the permission necessary to dry dock his ship, the U.S.S. Kearsarge steamed into the harbor. Although Executive Officer John McIntosh Kell cautioned Semmes that, at target practice in the spring, two out of every three of the ship's fuses had been inoperative due to defective powder, Semmes' brave and aggressive spirit dominated. He was determined to fight the Kearsarge. During the 3 days of intense preparation for the battle, Semmes felt confident in his crew and in his ship. He expressed this sentiment in his journal where he wrote: "My crew seems to be in the right spirit, a quiet spirit of determination pervading both officers and men. The combat will no doubt be contested and obstinate, but the two ships are so equally matched that I do not feel at liberty to decline it."

On Sunday, June 19, 1864, a reported 17,000 spectators gathered on the French coast to witness the confrontation. Dozens of yachts and small craft followed as the band on a French warship played "Dixie." One of these spectators was the wealthy Englishman John Lancaster who was aboard his private yacht, the Deerhound. Also watching the contest from a private boat was the famed artist Edouard Manet.

After the Alabama chased the Kearsarge 7 miles out to sea, the Kearsarge turned around and headed for the Alabama. The Alabama discharged the first shot, which went too high. The Alabama then fires two more shots which were also too high. The Kearsarge's first shot struck the Alabama near her forward port and was followed by a full broadside to the Alabama. The ships then forced into a circular track traveling at full steam, moving in opposite directions and each fighting her starboard side. They made seven complete circles before the end of the action, gradually lessening the distance between them. The conflict continued with the Alabama firing at least two shots for every one fired by the Kearsarge. However, the Alabama generally fired too high.

With the action continuous on both sides, an 11-inch shell careened through the Alabama's gun port and wiped out "like a sponge from a blackboard one-half of the gun's crew." A second shell did further damage and when a third shell struck the breast of the gun carriage and spun around on deck without exploding, a compressor man quickly picked it up and threw it overboard.

After about 20 minutes of fighting, a shell from the Alabama struck the hull of the Kearsarge. The crew onboard the Alabama cheered wildly, believing that this shot had crippled the Kearsarge, before they realized that no damage had been done. Semmes was stunned in disbelief. Not knowing that the Kearsarge was protected by chains slung over her sides and then covered by wooden planks, he and his men continued to hope for the one shot which would disable the Kearsarge. That shot never came.

From the horse block, the highest point on the deck of the ship, Semmes observed the damage done to his ship by the enemy's fire. He was astonished by the accuracy of the enemy's guns and he offered a reward to any gun crew that could silence the guns which were damaging his ship and crew.

On shore, Captain Sinclair recognized part of the problem—the powder smoke of the Kearsarge was light, in contrast to puffs of heavy steam from the Alabama which indicated damaged powder. Even a hundred-pound shell which lodged in the rudderpost of the Kearsarge failed to explode—the failure due apparently to faulty powder.

Of the 370 shots they fired at the Kearsarge, only 28 hit their target and those shots caused only minor damage. There were no casualties and only three Union sailors were wounded.

The Alabama, on the other hand, suffered substantial damage. The rudder was damaged and steering was difficult. An 11-inch shell barreled through the Alabama's starboard side and emanated from her port side, leaving huge, gaping holes. A coal bunker collapsed and with only two boilers then working, the Alabama steamed ahead at greatly reduced speed. The Alabama now leaned heavily to starboard, filled with holes, smoke and seawater—but, in the spirit and tradition of men and women of the South, Semmes kept on fighting.

The story of this battle is long and told well by Dr. Norman C. Delany, author of the book, "John McIntosh Kell of the Raider Alabama":

[Semmes] believed that by shifting the weight of his battery from starboard to port he might raise the shot holes above the water line. The ship was now five miles from the coast and with luck might make the three-mile limit. He gave the order: "Mr. Kell, as soon as our head points to the French coast, * * * shift your guns to port and make all sail for the coast."

Then Kell appeared at the skylight above the engine room and shouted to the men below, "Put on steam!" Engineers William Brooks and Matt O'Brien, covered with sweat and coal dust, answered that the Alabama carried all the steam it could manage without blowing up. Then reconsidering, O'Brien declared: "Let her have the steam; we had better blow her to hell than to let the Yankees whip us!" But it would have taken more than a few extra pounds of steam pressure to save the Alabama. Winslow had anticipated Semmes' intentions and steamed across his adversary's bow.

Exhausted officers and sailors continued fighting from the port side, but with water rushing into the gangway at every roll, they felt that "the day was lost." O'Brien came on deck to report that the rapidly rising water was almost flush with the furnace fires * * *. Semmes listened in silence, then ordered: "Return to your duty!" The engineers felt certain that they would go down with the ship.

Semmes ordered Kell to determine how long the ship could remain afloat. Going below, Kell observed holes in the hull "large enough to admit a wheelbarrow." Kell returned to the deck and reported that the ship could not last for more than ten minutes. Semmes gave the order: "Then, sir, cease firing, shorten sail, and haul down the colors; it will never do in this nineteenth century for us to go down, and the decks covered with our gallant wounded." As there was no white flag available, a man on the spanker boom held up a makeshift one. Winslow, unconvinced that his enemy had surrendered, cried out: "Give it to them again, boys; they are playing us a trick!" Each of his gun captains obeyed instantly, firing five volleys into the Alabama * * *. Aboard the doomed Raider, Kell cried out: "Stand to your quarters, men. If we must be sunk after our colors are down, we will go to the bottom with every man at his post!" But when the white flag was again raised on the spanker boom, all firing ceased. Semmes then ordered Kell, "Dispatch an officer to the Kearsarge and ask that they send boats to save our wounded—ours are disabled."

Aboard the sinking vessel Kell gave the order to abandon ship and directed the men to find a spar or whatever else might assist them in keeping them afloat. Semmes, still wearing his cap, trousers and vest, grabbed a life preserver, discarded his sword and began to swim.

Later, Executive Officer Kell remembered looking back for his last view of the Alabama: "As the gallant vessel, the most beautiful I ever beheld, plunged down to her grave, I had it on my tongue to call the men who were struggling in the water to give three cheers for her, but the dead that were floating around me and the sadness I felt at parting with the noble ship that had been my home so long deterred me."

Many survivors were picked up by the Kearsarge and taken prisoner; however, Semmes, along with some other crew members, was rescued by the private yacht, the Deerhound. As the Alabama sank stern first, the Deerhound was observed to be stealing away. Guns were turned toward her but Kearsarge Captain Winslow ordered his men not to fire. The Deerhound steamed toward England and thus Semmes escaped. In 1865, Semmes returned to the Confederacy where he continued fighting until the war's end. After the war, he returned to Mobile where he practiced law until his death in 1877.

The C.S.S. Alabama, which sank in what were then high seas, was located within the French territorial waters by a French minesweeper in 1984.

THE "U.S.S. SOMERS"

On April 16, 1842, the U.S. Brig Somers was launched by the New York Naval Yard. On that day, she began her career as one of the most famed sailing ships in the history of the U.S. Navy. She was not a very large vessel, only 102 feet overall, weighing 259 tons. Although she was trim and very fast for her size, she was very much overrigged, with a mainmast that towered 130 feet above the deck. This was one of the factors that led to her eventual capsizing and foundering off of the coast of Veracruz, Mexico, on December 8, 1846.

On September 13, 1842, the Somers left New York under the command of Alexander Slidell Mackenzie for a training cruise to the Atlantic coast of Africa. The events which occurred onboard the Somers during this journey ensured her place in U.S. naval history. On this training cruise, the Somers was the scene of an attempted mutiny. The leader of the mutiny was Philip Spencer, the 18-year-old son of U.S. Secretary of War John Canfield Spencer. As a result of his mutinous activities, Philip Spencer was hanged, along with two other accused mutineers. Upon returning to New York, the mutiny and the hangings became the great controversial topics of the day.

In fact, Herman Melville, whose cousin was second-in-command of the Somers, became obsessed with the attempted mutiny. These events went on to inspire Melville's classic tale of brutality and injustice, "Billy Budd." In "Billy Budd," Melville writes:

Not unlikely they were brought to something more or less akin to that harassed frame of mind which in the year 1842 actuated the commander of the U.S. brig-of-war Somers to resolve, under the so-called Articles of War, Articles modeled upon the English Mutiny Act, to resolve upon the execution at sea of a midshipman and two petty officers as mutineers designing the seizure of the brig.

Although the Somers continued her service in the U.S. Navy, the mutiny and hangings would never be forgotten. According to published reports and memoirs of her crew members, up until 2 weeks before she sank in Mexican waters, there were traditions aboard the ship concerning ghosts of the mutineers seen in the rigging, most often on dark, stormy nights.

The Somers ended her illustrious career in 1846, after the outbreak of the United States-Mexican War during which she had been assigned the responsibility of blockading the Port of Veracruz. Lt. Comdr. Raphael Semmes—a famous Alabamian who would later become a naval hero for his service during the War Between the States—was the captain of the Somers. On December 8, 1846, while chasing a Mexican ship attempting to run the blockade, the Somers capsized and sank within 10 minutes. Two days later, on December 10, 1846, Captain Semmes filed the following report:

Sir: It becomes my painful duty to inform you of the loss of the U.S. Brig Somers, late under my command, and of the drowning of more than half her crew. The details of this sad catastrophe are briefly, as follows: After having been forty-five days maintaining the blockade of Veracruz, I anchored, on the evening of the 7th inst., under Verde Island; where it had been my practice to take shelter from the north-west gales, that blow with such frequency and violence along this coast, at this season of the year * * *.

Semmes continued to describe how rescue efforts were made but only 37 of the 76 crew members managed to survive. Semmes was later acquitted from any responsibility he might have had in the loss of the U.S. Somers and half of her crew.

The Somers was located deep in the waters off Veracruz, Mexico, in June 1986. This ship is believed to be the best and one of the only shipwrecks found of its historical period, the 1840's.

By Mr. EXON:

S. 353. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to allow the use of U.S. savings bonds for any individual's higher education expenses to qualify for an income exclusion; to the Committee on Finance.

INCOME EXCLUSION FOR EDUCATIONAL SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which will build upon legislation passed last year. As part of the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act, Congress included a provision that allowed interest earned on U.S. savings bonds to be exempt from gross income if the bonds were used for higher education tuition and fees. However, this exemption is only available for individuals, age 24 or older, who have purchased and are sole owners of the bonds, or who own such bonds jointly with their spouse and the bonds are used for the educational expenses of the individual, his or her spouse and dependents.

My legislation will open up that exemption by allowing relatives and friends to also purchase bonds to be used for the educational expenses of a student. My legislation does not change any other provision of the law passed last year. The relatives and friends will have to meet the age 24 requirement and also buy and hold the bonds in their own name and redeem the bonds using the appropriate procedures as set forth in the law to receive the exemption.

I think this is straight forward legislation. It simply allows Grandma, Uncle Fred, or Mom's dearest friend Lucille to help pay tuition costs for a student and receive the interest exemption.

Most families spend a lifetime trying to save enough money to send their children to college. A college education is part of the American dream, however, with the rising cost of education, it is becoming more and more difficult for families to afford this expense. Ten years ago, grants comprised 80 percent of the average student aid package, with loans making up less than 20 percent. Today, a student aid package is comprised of more than 50 percent loans, leaving grants to make up less than 48 percent for the average aid package. And now, with new graduates facing a debt of tens of thousands of dollars at the beginning of their working lives, even loans are moving out of the reach of many individuals. We are quickly moving backward in time to the day when a college education was a privilege reserved only for the wealthy.

We clearly need to help the lower and middle income families regain some financial stability and hold on to whatever meager economic security they gained a few years ago. Savings bonds are an easy, economical and familiar way to save.

Mr. KENNEDY was the moving force behind the legislation adopted last year and I thank him for bringing this issue before Congress and the American people. I began working on this idea of expanding benefits last year as well. Since passage of that legislation I have received several inquiries from individuals expressing strong interest in the program. However, many were disappointed to find out that as a friend or relative, they were ineligible for the exemption. If we are trying to stimulate savings, and encourage education, why limit the incentive to such a small audience? When it comes to financing the soaring costs of postsecondary education, every little bit helps.

Although some States, such as Michigan, have already established their own tuition assistance program, this idea has been slow to catch on. There are also some serious concerns about how helpful these types of programs will be. Savings bonds are completely portable and will follow a student to any qualified school he or she should choose to attend, whether "in-state" or "out-of-state," a 4-year liberal arts school or a 2-year vocational technical school.

Mr. President, this is a small step in the long journey of making college affordable again. Howver, I think it is a very important one. I urge swift consideration of this legislation and encourage my colleagues to join me in supporting and cosponsoring this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the text of the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 353

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. INCOME EXCLUSION FOR EDUCATIONAL SAVINGS BONDS EXPANDED.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraph (A) of section 135(c)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (defining qualified higher education expenses) is amended to read as follows:

"(A) IN GENERAL.—The term 'qualified higher education expenses' means tuition and fees required for enrollment or attendance of any individual at an eligible educational institution.".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendment made by this section shall take effect as if included in the amendments made by section 6009 of the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988.

By Mr. EXON (for himself, Mr. BOREN, and Mr. SHELBY):

S. 354. A bill to provide that during a 2-year period each item of any bill making appropriations that is agreed to by both Houses of the Congress in the same form shall be enrolled as a separate joint resolution for presentation to the President; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

LINE-ITEM VETO

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, on the first working day of this Congress I took the floor to discuss our Nation's most pressing economic priority; that is, deficit reduction and to introduce a proposed constitutional amendment to require the President to submit and the Congress to enact a balanced Federal budget.

Today I rise to introduce legislation which would give the President line-item veto authority which would apply to appropriations bills. This legislation is similar to the line-item veto bill which was cosponsored by 37 Senators in the last Congress.

I am proud to have Senator BOREN and Senator SHELBY as original cosponsors of this measure.

Both former Senator Dan Evans, the sponsor of line-item veto legislation in the last Congress, and I were once Governors who had the line-item veto authority. I can personally attest that this power was a very useful tool in controlling spending and keeping the Nebraska State budget in balance. It is time that the President be given the authority that 43 Governors now have.

Throughout my years in public life I have been an advocate for fiscal responsibility. Like many Americans, I deeply hold the common-sense belief that a Nation, just like a family or a business can not remain economically strong if it consistently spends more than it earns.

Somewhere along the way, Congress and the President lost sight of the principle of fiscal discipline. When I came to the Senate, our Nation faced a deficit for fiscal year 1979 of $27.7 billion. Today, our Nation faces an annual deficit that is over six times as large. The total Federal debt for fiscal year 1979 was $833.8 billion. The total Federal debt today exceeds $2.6 trillion. The time has come to employ new devices to control Federal spending.

The line-item veto and the balanced budget constitutional amendment are two long-term structural changes that can be made to our Federal budget procedures to restore some degree of fiscal discipline.

When I was Governor of the great State of Nebraska, I had the benefit of the line-item veto power and a constitutional amendment which required a balanced budget. Both were powerful tools in restraining the spending of the Nebraska State Legislature. Just as important, the two constitutional provisions put the Governor at the center of the annual budget debate. With line-item veto, all parties were made responsible for their budget actions.

A Federal line-item veto would finally give the President the no-excuses ability to show leadership on the Federal budget.

If the President had line-item veto authority, he could remove the middle-of-the-night pork barrel legislation which has a habit of sneaking into must pass appropriations bills. He would also be held responsible for failing to exercise his new power.

Like the balanced budget amendment, the line-item veto is not a cure-all. However, it will help. Given the seriousness of the deficit situation, we must take every available means to reduce wasteful spending.

If any vetoed spending item is important enough, Congress can override the President's line-item veto. As an added protection, the legislation I propose would sunset within 2 years if not reauthorized.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to give this legislation serious consideration. The line-item veto works well in many States of the Union and, at a minimum, it should be given a chance at the Federal level.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 354

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. ENROLLMENT OF CERTAIN JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

(2) A bill that is required to be enrolled pursuant to paragraph (1)—

(A) shall be enrolled without substantive revision,

(B) shall conform in style and form to the applicable provisions of chapter 2 of title 1, United States Code (as such provisions are in effect on the date of the enactment of this section), and

(C) shall bear the designation of the measure of which it was an item prior to such enrollment, together with such other designation as may be necessary to distinguish such bill from other joint resolutions enrolled pursuant to paragraph (1) with respect to the same measure.

(b) PROCEDURES.—A bill enrolled pursuant to paragraph (1) of subsection (a) with respect to an item shall be deemed to be a bill under Clauses 2 and 3 of Section 7 of Article 1 of the Constitution of the United states and shall be signed by the presiding officers of both Houses of the Congress and presented to the President for approval or disapproval (and otherwise treated for all purposes) in the manner provided for bills and joint resolutions generally.

(c) DEFINITION.—For purposes of this section, the term "item" means any numbered section and any unnumbered paragraph of any bill making continuing appropriations.

(d) APPLICATION.—The provisions of this section shall apply to bill agreed to by the Congress during the two-calendar-year period beginning with the date of the enactment of this section.

By Mr. RIEGLE (for himself, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. DODD, Mr. PELL, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. BOND, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. SASSER, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. REID, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. GORE, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. SARBANES, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. SHELBY, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. BUMPERS, Mr. COHEN, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. GRASSLEY, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. MCCONNELL, and Mr. LIEBERMAN):

S. 355. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to extend through 1992 the period during which qualified mortgage bonds and mortgage credit certificates may be issued; to the Committee on Finance.

ISSUANCE OF QUALIFIED MORTGAGE BONDS AND MORTGAGE CREDIT CERTIFICATES

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to extend the Mortgage Revenue Bond [MRB] and the Mortgage Credit Certificate [MCC] programs for an additional 3 years. I am pleased to be joined in offering this legislation with over 30 of my colleagues in the Senate.

For 50 years the Federal Government along with State and local governments and the American housing industry have collaborated to make America the best-housed Nation in the world. It is a partnership that has worked well.

Yet, recent statistics suggest that the dream of homeownership is becoming more and more difficult to achieve for many Americans. Today, the Nation's homeownership rate is at its lowest level in 15 years. This decline occurs at a time when members of the baby boom are at the prime home-buying age and during one of the most sustained economic recoveries on record.

As many of my colleagues know, MRB's are issued by State and local housing agencies to provide funds for home mortgages at rates about 2 percentage points below the market rate. This, in turn, helps to ease the problem of housing affordability for many young families seeking to purchase their first home.

Since its inception, the Mortgage Revenue Bond Program has helped to finance over 900,000 homes. The national average household income of MRB financed is $26,000.

Mortgage Credit Certificates like MRB's are also issued by State and local housing agencies to provide financial assistance to first-time homebuyers. With an MCC, a homeowner may take a credit each year against his or her tax liability for a portion of mortgage interest paid.

My home State of Michigan has been a pioneer in the use of mortgage credit certificates. The total volume of mortgage credit certificates in Michigan is now $140 million. These certificates have been servicing households, on average, with incomes of $22,500 and now operate through 136 lenders in over 1,000 branches in Michigan.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, current authority for these programs are set to expire in December of 1989. The legislation I am introducing today extends these sunset dates through the end of 1992. Identical legislation is being introduced in the House of Representatives by Congressman DONNELLY.

I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support this legislation and to keep in place two valuable programs that aid and promote first-time homeownership throughout the Nation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 355

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subparagraph (B) of section 143(a)(1) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 is amended by striking out "1989" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "1992".

(b) Subsection (h) of section 25 of such Code is amended by striking out "1989" and inserting in lieu thereof "1992".

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of legislation that extends the life of the Mortgage Revenue Bond Program. This program has provided a substantial boost to homebuyers throughout the Nation. In New York, mortgage revenue bonds have created an exemplary low-cost housing program for nearly 45,000 families—many of whom would not have qualified for conventional financing. I commend my colleague Senator RIEGLE for his commitment and dedication to providing affordable housing opportunities to homebuyers across the country.

As we all know, the very existence of the Mortgage Revenue Bond Program was called into question last year as it was scheduled to sunset on December 31, 1988. However, on November 11, 1988, President Reagan signed into law H.R. 4333, the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988. This law extends the authority of State and local governments to issue qualified mortgage bonds (mortgage revenue bonds) and mortgage credit certificates for financing single-family, owner-occupied housing until December 31, 1989. As the ranking member of the Housing Subcommittee and a strong proponent of homeownership, I was pleased to cosponor and support this legislation.

While I support the efforts of this new law, I believe that it does not go far enough. We need to further extend the MRB Program to assist even more homebuyers. The legislation that we are introducing today will do just that—extend the sunset date to December 31, 1992—and open the door of homeownership to many more Americans.

I am pleased that the Congress was able to see the merit in continuing a program that provides first time homebuyers an opportunity that they might not otherwise have. I am now hopeful that Congress will recognize the importance of this program. I commend my colleague, Mr. RIEGLE, chairman of the Banking Committee, for introducing this legislation, and I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsorship.●

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join in introducing S. 355 to extend the authorization of the Mortgage Revenue Bond Program in the Internal Revenue Code from the current expiration date of December 31, 1989 until December 31, 1992.

Recent testimony before the Senate Housing Subcommittee suggests that the dream of homeownership is becoming more and more difficult to achieve for many Americans. Today, the Nation's homeownership rate is at its lowest level in 15 years. This decline occurs at a time when members of the baby boom are at the prime homebuying age and during one of the most sustained and vigorous housing recoveries on record.

Homeownership is an important part of the American dream and I believe we must continue to provide tax incentives for programs that assist low-income Americans in acquiring their first home. We must reverse the declining homeownership trend that has existed in this country since 1980.

The Mortgage Revenue Bond [MRB] Program authorizes States to issue tax-exempt mortgage revenue bonds to provide below marketrate financing for the purchase of homes by citizens in those States. This below marketrate financing allows first time homebuyers to purchase a home, when they would not be able to buy a house with any of the conventional financing methods.

In 1986, we adopted a State volume cap which placed a limit on the total amount of private purpose tax-exempt bonds that could be issued by a State. The MRB Program expands the types of private-purpose bonds that can be issued by a State within its volume cap. I believe it is vitally important that we allow States to utilize the volume cap in the most beneficial way for each State's businesses and citizens.

The General Accounting Office issued a report last year analyzing the Mortgage Revenue Bond Program. I was troubled by many of the conclusions that were drawn from the data in the study. The study covered the State MRB programs from November 1983 through June 1987, and as a result, a majority of the information, on which the study is based, comes from a period before the program was targeted toward low-income, first time homebuyers.

The report states that with the additional assistance of an adjustable rate mortgage [ARM], 79 percent of the participants in the State MRB programs could have bought the same house, or one within 10 percent of its purchase price. This statistic bolsters an argument that MRB programs are not absolutely necessary to provide housing to participants. However, this conclusion is not valid, since we do not know how much of that 79 percent represents people in the "within 10 percent of purchase price" category. In many areas of this country, homebuyers may not be able to find a house for less than the price they paid, especially not 10 percent less.

The Mortgage Revenue Bond Program is an important part of the State housing program in my home State. I have received a great deal of information from the Rhode Island Housing and Mortgage Finance Corporation, which manages the MRB Program in my State, that illustrates the vital importance of this program to fulfilling the homeownership dreams of low-income Americans.

In the 15 years that Rhode Island Housing and Mortgage Finance Corporation has existed, almost 35,000 families have been able to purchase a home utilizing a mortgage from our MRB Program. The managers of the MRB Program have calculated that approximately 80 percent of the families served by the MRB Program would not have been able to qualify for a conventional mortgage.

The average family income of the participants in the Rhode Island MRB Program is $24,845—well below Rhode Island's $33,700 statewide median income. The average age of mortgage recipients is 31.6 years, which indicates that the program is not assisting only young people right out of college. It is helping young families who may have been in the workforce for 10 or more years before they could afford to buy a house.

First homes, the current mortgage program being sponsored by Rhode Island Housing and Mortgage Finance Corporation, offers qualified buyers a fixed interest rate of 8.9 percent, a minimum downpayment requirement of 4–5 percent. The average loan amount, for homes sold under First Homes, is $80,925 on an average sales price of $88,027. This sales price is almost $40,000 less than the median sales price of an existing single-family home in my State. The Rhode Island Association of Realtors has computed the median sales price to be $127,200.

This provides ample evidence that it is imperative for us to extend the authority of the States to issue tax-exempt bonds to provide mortgage revenue bond financing to our young families who would not otherwise be able to fulfill the American dream by purchasing a first home.

Thank you, Mr. President.

By Mr. GRAMM:

S. 356. A bill to authorize negotiation of a North American free trade area, to promote free trade, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

AMERICAN TRADE, GROWTH, AND EMPLOYMENT PROMOTION ACT

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which, if implemented, would result in a new era of economic growth and prosperity for the United States and for each country that becomes part of the expanded trade program that the bill outlines. The American Trade, Growth, and Employment Promotion Act would increase economic opportunity by expanding the markets for U.S. exports while at the same time increasing the quality and variety of choices for American consumers. This will lead to more and better jobs here in the United States and in the countries with which we do business.

Mr. President, for over 200 years it has been well known that expanded trade benefits the many, while restricted trade—particularly protectionism—benefits only a privileged few. This legislation that I am today introducing would benefit America not by erecting new trade barriers, not by creating new benefits for privileged groups at the expense of the average citizen. It would benefit America by establishing free trade agreements and expanded trade areas, made up of countries that are willing to lower trade barriers and increase mutual prosperity. The countries that follow protectionist policies would be left out in the cold, they would risk being left behind, unless they, too, abandoned their protectionist policies and joined the trade barrier reduction effort.

Fortunately, this process has already begun. It started when 13 loosely linked States gave up their trade barriers with each other to form what has become the wealthiest nation the world has ever known. Another major step forward in this process was taken with the recent conclusion of the free trade agreements between the United States and Israel and the United States and Canada. And the Europeans are following this pattern as well, with a comprehensive reduction in economic barriers within the European Community scheduled for 1992.

Mr. President, I look forward to the day when the United States is part of a free trade area extending from Point Barrow, AK, to Cape Horn. That will take some time to accomplish, but we already have an agreement reaching down to the Rio Grande. There is no economic reason why we should not have a free trade agreement with Mexico. The real barriers are political ones. The success of the Maquiladora Program demonstrates that the elimination of trade barriers adds to the prosperity of both our countries. Mexico's current international debt problems are the result of resistance to freer markets in trade and investment. To the extent that the Government leaders in Mexico take effective action to address the fundamental causes of their international debt problem, they will be making progress toward the establishment of a free trade area, and they have already taken some important steps in this regard.

We should also pursue opportunities to conclude agreements for expanded trade areas with other countries that may not be willing to take the complete step of a free trade area. Such expanded trade agreements, while stopping short of total free trade, would still provide for mutual reduction in a broad range of trade barriers. Mr. President, I can think of no more effective way of encouraging the Japanese to abandon unfair trade barriers than for the United States to pursue expanded trade agreements with their chief competitors: Korea, Taiwan, or the ASEAN countries. We would all benefit if we did.

Mr. President, we need to continue the momentum for free trade, because there will always be a strong protectionist head wind. I urge my colleagues to join in this effort.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 356

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "American Trade, Growth, and Employment Promotion Act".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) The income of the United States and its trading partners is increased by the mutual reduction of trade barriers.

(2) The free trade agreements into which the United States has entered with Israel and Canada symbolize the path of prosperity for the United States in its trade relations into the next century.

(3) The establishment of a North American Free Trade Area will promote the mutual reduction of trade barriers with countries outside of the North American continent as well, initiating a series of trade barrier reductions, instead of the series of trade barrier increases likely to result from a resort to protectionism and trade retaliation.

(4) Trade protectionism endangers economic prosperity in the United States and globally and undermines civil liberty and constitutionally limited government abroad.

(5) The reduction of government interference in the foreign and domestic sectors of a nation's economy and the concomitant promotion of economic opportunity and freedoms promote civil liberty and constitutionally limited government.

(6) Developing countries that observe a consistent policy of free trade, the promotion of free enterprise and other economic freedoms (including protection of private property), the removal of barriers to foreign direct investment, in the context of constitionally limited government and minimal government interference in the economy, will follow the surest and most effective prescription to alleviate poverty and provide for economic, social, and political development.

S. 357. A bill to provide that the Secretary of Transportation may not issue regulations reclassifying anhydrous ammonia under the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

CLASSIFICATION OF ANHYDROUS AMMONIA

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, today the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIXON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. NICKLES], and myself, joined by 18 of our colleagues, are introducing legislation to prevent the Secretary of Transportation from reclassifying the common fertilizer compound, anhydrous ammonia, as a poisonous gas.

Anhydrous ammonia is the liquid form of pure ammonia gas. It is commercially formed by compressing dry ammonia (NH_3), which is itself produced by what is known as the Haber process. This involves the combining of nitrogen and hydrogen in the presence of a catalyst at 550 degrees Centigrade and at 200 to 250 times normal atmospheric pressure. In nature, ammonia is produced every time a plant or animal dies and undergoes decomposition by certain bacteria or fungi. These microorganisms produce ammonia from the nitrogen compounds found in decomposing organic matter and in the body waste excreted by animals. That is why barnyard manure has such an acrid smell, and it also happens to be the same reason why manure is such a good fertilizer.

Because anhydrous ammonia is 82 percent nitrogen, the compound makes an excellent nitrogen-enhancing fertilizer. It is commonly used by farmers throughout the Nation in a mixture with water. This solution is then applied directly to a field. It can also be used in a mixture containing compounds of phosphorus and potassium.

I offer this brief background, Mr. President, because information is usually the best cure for unfounded fear. Those unfamiliar with anhydrous ammonia may assume it to be a complex and deadly gas concocted by mad scientists in some weapons research laboratory. As you see, it is far from that.

Farmers have used anhydrous ammonia for many decades now, it being one of the most beneficial and least costly methods to increase the nitrogen in soil. Nitrogen is essential to animal and plant life, and, if present in sufficient quantity, can enhance growing conditions and the production of food crops. It is estimated that, without this critical nutrient added artificially by fertilizers, one-third of the world's food production would disappear.

The use of this fertilizer, however, is now being placed in jeopardy by a proposal advanced by the U.S. Department of Transportation. In May of 1987, DOT issued a notice of proposed rulemaking to change the classification of anhydrous ammonia, which is currently labeled "nonflammable gas," to "poisonous gas." According to the testimony presented by the Office of Transportation in the U.S. Department of Agriculture, this proposal "stems primarily from a desire to adopt the U.N. list of hazardous materials in order to achieve international conformity." Since that time, however, the U.N. Committee of Experts on the Transportation of Dangerous Goods has refused to confirm "poisonous gas" classification for the next 2 years while it considers alternative classifications.

It is generally agreed that "poisonous gas" labeling will add little or no additional safety in the handling of anhydrous ammonia. Handling procedures have been developed by farmers and farm suppliers over the course of the last 30 years. Excellent training programs exist, and the basics of ammonia detection and safety are a party of nearly every farmer's education.

Such reclassification will, however, severely hurt the economy by raising the cost of fertilizer. The "poisonous gas" label may also hamper U.S. efforts to capture and maintain sensitive foreign markets. Many of our foreign customers have prohibitions against importing food treated with poisonous chemicals. The absurdity of such a label is made additionally apparent if you remember that ammonia is commonly produced in nature by decomposing bacteria in the soil. Everything that grows in the soil is, to some extent, treated with ammonia.

That is why we are introducing this legislation today to prohibit the DOT from carrying out its proposed "poisonous gas" labeling for anhydrous ammonia. The original reason for the proposal in the first place, to make the United States uniform with United Nation standards, is no longer valid. The damage such a proposal does to American agriculture is completely unjustified.

I urge those in this body who have not already joined on as cosponsors of this measure to do so. It is imperative that we move this bill swifty toward enactment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objections, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 357

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Transportation may not issue regulations under the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act that reclassify or relabel anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas, for purposes of such Act.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I rise to voice my support for, and cosponsorship of, a bill introduced today by Senator STEVE SYMMS and Senator ALAN DIXON to provide that the Secretary of Transportation may not issue regulations under the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act which would reclassify anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas. I previously cosponsored this bill in the 100th Congress when it was introduced by Senator DAVID KARNES.

This bill, Mr. President, is intended to prevent DOT from making what I see as a terrible mistake. Classifying anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas could have very serious adverse effects on farmers and many other segments of the agricultural community. About half of all nitrogen fertilizer used by farmers is applied as anhydrous ammonia. This proposed rule change would drastically increase the cost of nitrogen fertilizer for the American farmer. In addition, insurance costs for transporting the chemical would be prohibitive and it is also conceivable that, in some cases, insurance would become unavailable.

This dispute began in May 1987, when the Department of Transportation proposed regulations which would establish a new classification for some 70 substances. One of the gases proposed to be reclassified as poisonous was anhydrous ammonia, an important agricultural fertilizer which was previously classified as nonflammable.

Understandably, DOT's proposal met with immediate opposition from farm State Congressmen and Senators and most of the agriculture community. DOT received over 1,000 comments on the general proposal, 700 of which were specifically directed to the proposed reclassification of anhydrous ammonia. In addition, the Senate and House committee reports accompanying the transportation appropriations bill for fiscal year 1989 both contained a provision which called on DOT to drop their proposal.

However, instead of heeding Congress' disapproval and dropping the proposal altogether, DOT has instead issued a supplemental notice of rulemaking to obtain additional comments on the proposed reclassification of anhydrous ammonia. DOT will be accepting these additional comments until March 9, 1989, and they have stated that the final rule will not be issued before the end of 1989.

The options which DOT intends to consider for the final rule include: adopt the proposed reclassification, adopt the proposed reclassification with special provisions based on the nature of the operation—such as farming—or adopt a new classification—such as corrosive. I feel it is worth mentioning that our largest trading partner with regard to anhydrous ammonia is Canada, which classifies the substance as a corrosive gas.

We have also seen, in the current dispute between the United States and the European Community, a situation in which hormones which have been proven safe in this country are used as a trade barrier. What will be the reaction of the public and our trading partners when they see American farmers applying what the Federal Government says is a poisonous gas to their wheat crops?

Mr. President, I feel it is vital that this legislation be introduced to show the Department of Transportation that we will not allow the Federal rulemaking process to burden the agriculture sector with unnecessary and costly regulations. I thank Senator SYMMS and Senator DIXON for introducing this legislation, and I urge our colleagues to join us in a show of unified support for American agriculture, and unified opposition to "big brother" regulation.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, as many of us are keenly aware, the Department of Transportation [DOT] has proposed the reclassification of anhydrous ammonia from a nonflammable gas to a poisonous gas. Such a reclassification poses many serious problems for American agriculture. Unfortunately, DOT seems to be pushing ahead with its proposal, totally disregarding the disastrous ramifications of such an action.

Anhydrous ammonia is an essential chemical for agriculture. Approximately 45 percent of all nitrogen fertilizer used by American farmers is applied as anhydrous ammonia. It is used widely because it is inexpensive. Spreading nitrogen with anhydrous ammonia is 50 percent cheaper than performing the same activity with other compounds.

Mr. President, many of us in Congress believe that DOT's reclassification proposal is unfounded and reckless—and it seriously misrepresents legitimate concerns for health and safety.

Reclassifying anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas provides little in the way of added safety. What does result from such a reclassification, however, are serious unintended consequences. Reclassifying anhydrous ammonia as a poison will dramatically increase the cost of nitrogen fertilizer. Insurance costs for transporting the chemical would be prohibitive, and it is also conceivable that, in some cases, insurance would become unavailable. Furthermore, there is some question as to how anhydrous ammonia, if classified as a poison, could be transported to American farms. Even more alarming, as a result of DOT action, many foreign markets, which our farmers are struggling to recapture, would be closed because of legal restrictions on foods treated with poisonous chemicals.

The underlying reason for the Department of Transportation's proposal to reclassify anhydrous ammonia as a poisonous gas was to achieve some degree of international uniformity. During its December 1988 meeting in Geneva, however, the U.N. Committee of Experts on the Transportation of Dangerous Goods decided to postpone an international classification decision. The postponement decision was based on the fact that the international experts wanted to consider the corrosive properties of the material. In light of the United Nation's decision, the Department of Transportation's push to reclassify, in the face of the severe domestic consequences that it would inflict on American agriculture, is outlandish.

If the true purpose of reclassification is to alert its users of the possible dangers inherent in the use of this product, a more appropriate reclassification would be that of a corrosive product, rather than a poison.

Mr. President, our largest trading partner in anhydrous ammonia—Canada—identifies it in this manner. This type of classification serves to alert users of potential dangers while avoiding the negative economic impact that would result on our American farmers.

Since the Department of Transportation has been unable to resolve this serious problem in a responsible fashion, we in Congress must provide the solution. This legislation provides such a solution. I urge my colleagues to support this important bill.

By Mr. KENNEDY (for himself and Mr. SIMPSON):

S. 358. A bill to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act to change the level and preference system for admission of immigrants to the United States, and to provide for administrative naturalization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

IMMIGRATION REFORM LEGISLATION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague from Wyoming, Senator AL SIMPSON, in reintroducing the major immigration reform bill we drafted in the last Congress, "The Immigration Act of 1989."

The bill we are introducing today is, without change, the bill the Senate adopted on March 15, 1988, by a vote of 88 to 4. We believe the goals of this bill deserve the same strong support this year—not only because the issues haven't changed—but because the need for genuine immigration reform remains as urgent today as it was last year, and the years before that.

By building upon the Senate's action last year, we hope our colleagues in the House of Representatives will have ample opportunity to review and act upon these longstanding reforms.

Mr. President, Senator SIMPSON and I have worked closely for many months to fashion this legislation. Our bill builds upon the proposals contained in the 1981 report of the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy—a Commission upon which both of us served.

Under Senator SIMPSON's leadership, the 1986 Immigration Reform and Control Act—which was also based on the Select Commission's recommendations—was debated for several years and finally adopted, but it dealt only with the complex issue of illegal immigration. Left for the future was the other half of the Commission's recommendations, the proposals for legal immigration reform. This is the issue before the Congress today, and the proposals have been extensively debated and reviewed. The essential provisions of our bill have been adopted three times by the U.S. Senate—in 1982, 1983, and 1988. As the committee report on the bill noted last year:

> Few legislative proposals have had greater scrutiny or consideration than the immigration reforms contained in the pending bill. For more than a decade, reforming the system by which we select and admit immigrants has been the subject of interagency task forces, special commissions, and lengthy debate in Congress.

This bill reflects these years of study and deliberation, and it represents a consensus on what needs to be done.

Both Senator SIMPSON and I made it clear during last year's debate that our goal is to make our immigration system more accurately reflect the national interest, more flexible, and also more open to immigrants from nations which are short-changed by current law. Our bill accomplishes these objectives while fully maintaining the traditional priority we have given to those in other lands with family ties to the United States, and while preserving the fundamental principles of equity and fairness established in the 1965 reforms.

The bill creates two separate immigrant-visa preference systems: one for family members, and another for independent immigrants. 55,000 visas will be added to the new independent category; these visas will be available to most users of the present immigration system as well as to earlier sources of immigration to the United States. Because the largest share of all visas will still be reserved for family members of recent immigrants, the intent of the 1965 reforms is maintained.

By redressing the imbalances in immigration which have inadvertently developed in recent years, America will open its doors again to those who no longer have immediate family ties in the United States.

By placing more emphasis on the skills and qualities that independent immigrants possess, immigration policy will be more closely coordinated with the national interest. Under this bill, many countries which currently send only a few hundred immigrants per year to the United States may eventually receive a fairer share of our available immigrant visas. The overall benefit to this country will also increase, because a larger proportion of immigrants will have labor market skills.

In short, the bill we are proposing sustains the current emphasis on family reunification, while at the same time opening opportunities for new seed immigrants without family ties. And we do this not by restricting family visas but by providing additional visas for an independent category of immigrants. We have maintained our traditional priority for family reunification, while alleviating the unfair discrimination that current law imposes on other immigrants.

This bill also sets a national ceiling on immigration, within which all immigrants will be counted, except refugees and asylees, whose admission will still be controlled by the refugee Act of 1980. The level is set at 590,000 for the first 3 years—100,000 higher than the current level.

Within the overall level, we adjust the family preference system to give greater priority to the closest of family members. An additional 30,000 visas are provided to reduce the existing backlog in the current preference category for brothers and sisters of U.S. citizens.

The new category for indpendent immigrants is created for those with skills in short supply in the United States, and those in nations who have been unable to obtain visas under the current system because they have no family connections in this country.

We also assure a regular review of the immigration laws by requiring the administration to report every year on the effects of immigration, by requiring the administration to recommend changes in the level of immigration every 3 years, and by adoption of expedited parliamentary procedures to force Congress to implement these recommendations.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me restate our objective in reintroducing this legislation just as it passed the Senate last year. We simply want to begin the dialog again, and to renew the effort to achieve needed immigration reform.

Neither Senator SIMPSON nor I are frozen in our views on this bill, and there is clearly room for further debate and compromise. But I hope we will debate the issue on the merits, and not on the distortions and misperceptions that characterized much of the discussion last year.

For example, there is nothing in this bill that says English language is a requirement for immigration to the United States. It is simply one of the points that can be achieved in the new point system and for only one small part of the new independent preference system—not for all immigrants. But if this small requirement so distorts debate over the legislation, I, for one, am prepared to drop it.

Similarly, I am prepared to review the concerns that were expressed over the modifications in the sixth preference, to reopen it in some way for unskilled workers, but not at the exclusion of a stronger preference for skilled workers. Some compromise language is clearly possible in this and other areas—all of which we are prepared to review during the hearing we have scheduled on this bill on March 3d.

Mr. President, these reforms are long overdue, and I am grateful to Senator SIMPSON for his bipartisan cooperation and support in developing this legislation. From the earliest days of our history, America has been a beacon of hope and opportunity to peoples in other lands. We are proud of our immigrant heritage, and we must do all we can to preserve that heritage, to build upon it, and to strengthen it for the future.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am most pleased to join with my friend Senator KENNEDY, the chairman of the Immigration Subcommittee, in introducing legislation to reform our system for admitting permanent legal immigrants.

This legislation was passed last year by the Senate by a vote of 88 to 4. Unfortunately, action on the legislation was not completed by the House of Representatives in the 100th Congress, so we are reintroducing the bill. No substantial changes have been made from the bill that left the Senate last year: In essence, we have only changed the effective dates and corrected some inadvertent drafting errors. However, we will be holding hearings in early March should any Member or interested organization wish to propose changes to the legislation. We will also receive a report from the GAO at that hearing on the likely effect of this legislation on U.S. immigration patterns for the next decade. I am confident that this will provide us with the full hearing record that has become the hallmark of Senate consideration of vital immigration legislation.

I strongly believe that current immigration law does not serve the national interest as well as it should, and that we must revise it.

First, our Government cannot even inform us today as to how many people will enter the country through regular permanent immigrant channels during this year. When we need to analyze our labor market conditions, the demand on our social services, the effect of new residents on the environment, or the rate of our population growth, the current level of immigration is always a big question mark. I believe it is simply common sense to know in advance how many immigrants will be entering in a particular year.

I do not believe this number should be rigid. Immigration has been neglected by Congress for decades, but this neglect must change. Therefore, the legislation would set a national level of immigration at 590,000 immigrants per year—this is 80,000 to 100,000 persons per year higher than the current flow—and it would require the President to review annually the effect of immigration on the country, and to propose changes in the level every 3 years. Congress would be an active participant in any proposed revision of the national level of immigration.

Second, 95 percent of all legal immigrants are selected merely because they have a family connection in the United States. While I believe we should always preserve immigration rights for the spouses, parents, and children of citizens, and the spouses and children of permanent residents—as under current law—I do not believe that our system should automatically grant preferential status to aliens whose relationships are as distant as brother-in-law, sister-in-law, niece, and nephew. There is a growing demand for immigrants who possess certain skills and qualities that would serve the national interest. We should increase the proportion of such immigrants.

The bill, while retaining over 75 percent of the visas for family members, would increase the number and proportion of immigrants admitted who have offers of employment in the United States or who have certain characteristics—such as age, education, language skills, and occupational skills—which experts have determined will lead to successful economic integration. These immigrants would enter under a new category of independent immigration.

Third, 85 percent of all immigrants today come from two major areas of the world. Many of the older source countries of immigration—that is, Europe and Canada—no longer are able to qualify under today's family-dominated system, and some areas of the world have not in the past and do not now have the family ties necessary to send large numbers of immigrants to the United States—such as Africa. By increasing the number of visas allotted to independent immigrants, persons from a much larger number of countries will be able to apply for immigration, and our immigrant flow should become more diverse. While I believe that no potential immigrant should ever be discriminated against because of nationality or country of origin, I also feel that no country or region of the world should have a lock on our immigration system.

Mr. President, the time is very right for a revision of our legal immigration system. The bill contains flexibility both in the number of immigrants to be admitted and the types of independent immigrants that would qualify for admission. As we look toward a future where the only guarantee is rapid change, I believe we need an immigration law that is crafted to respond to these changes.

I look forward to working with my friend Senator TED KENNEDY on this ever present issue, and I commend this bill to my colleagues.

By Mr. NICKLES:

S. 359. A bill to prohibit the use of excess campaign funds for personal use; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

CAMPAIGN FINANCE ACCOUNTABILITY ACT

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today I am introducing two pieces of legislation both of which I hope we will be successful in passing this session of Congress. The first is legislation that would close the loophole that allows Members of Congress elected before 1980 to convert campaign funds, excess campaign funds, to personal use.

I introduce this bill in the context of campaign reform which has been debated at length before in the Senate. My legislation was filed as an amendment in 1987 to the campaign reform bill but unfortunately was not debated since no amendments were actually debated on the floor of the Senate.

Under current law, campaign funds which are left over from an election can be used for future elections, defrayal of Federal office holder expenses, donating to charity, contributions to national, State, or local party political committees, or repayment of loans made by the candidate to his campaign. It also allows the funds to be used for any lawful purpose, except for personal use. However, the personal use prohibition does not apply to candidates who were Members of Congress on January 8, 1980. Therefore, if you were elected before 1980 you may still use these funds for personal purposes.

Mr. President, that is wrong. We need to correct it. A lot of people talked about campaign reform. This is one area of campaign reform I think that every Member of Congress can agree upon. When we see a list of Members of Congress, whether it be in the House or Senate, and they accumulate hundreds of thousands of dollars, and then they retire, then later on we read where they have used those hundreds of thousands of dollars or converted them to personal use. Certainly that is a violation ethically in my opinion—it may not be a legal violation. We need to change it. We need to make it unlawful. That is exactly what my legislation would do.

My legislation would repeal this exception and prohibit all Members from converting these funds to personal use. Even though the Senate rules prohibit the conversion of campaign funds to the personal use of a Senator, the United States Code allows a special exception for Members in office as of January 8, 1980. My legislation seeks to repeal this exception in the Code and bring it into conformity with the Senate rules.

This is a matter of equity. In a review of the 1986 elections, House Members had nearly $50 million in surplus campaign funds. Most of those Members were covered by this grandfather clause. This is not appropriate public policy and should be changed. I urge my fellow Senators to support this legislation.

I ask unanimous consent that a Washington Post article appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BENEFITS EASE PATH OF CONGRESSIONAL RETIREES—GENEROSITY FOR DEPARTING LAWMAKERS BASED ON SPECIAL RULES

(By Charles R. Babcock)

As Fernand J. St Germain and Gene Taylor and many of their former House colleagues know, you can take it with you.

While they won't reap the benefits of the 51 percent pay raise scheduled to take effect Wednesday, retiring House members are able to take advantage of special rules written for and by themselves and entitling them to leftover campaign funds, office furniture and a pension sweeter than most others in the federal government.

Then they, like retiring senators, are free to stay in Washington as lawyers or consultants and go to work immediately lobbying their former colleagues. This is because they are not covered by the "revolving door" prohibitions on executive branch employees.

Congress' generosity with itself extends beyond prison walls and even the grave. In a little-known practice dating from the turn of the century, survivors of House members who die in office are given a year's pay. And House and Senate members convicted of a crime and expelled may still keep their taxpayer-subsidized pensions.

The perquisites of Congress periodically have been the subject of criticism, especially because of rules under which lawmakers and their staffs have to meet less stringent ethical and post-employment standards than executive branch employees. But seldom has as much attention been focused on the life style of members as during the public debate over the impending raise.

The Senate has tougher standards on several of these issues; House Speaker Jim Wright (D-Tex.) and Minority Leader Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.) have promised a bipartisan review of House ethics rules this year.

Among the special considerations available to retiring House members:

Converting campaign funds to personal use. The Senate prohibits this practice, but under a "grandfather" clause, House members who were in office before 1980 are permitted to take leftover campaign funds, declare them personal income, pay taxes on the amount and use the cash as they wish after they leave office. Members who have died have been able to pass the funds, sometimes several hundred thousand dollars, to heirs.

Former representative Taylor (R-Mo.), who retired after eight terms, led several more well-known retirees in the amount of leftover campaign funds he could convert to personal use. Federal Election Commission reports show he has nearly $458,000 available. The former auto dealer said in an interview in December that he had not decided what to do with this windfall.

"I will remain politically active, so I will use some that way," he said. Asked whether he intended to take some of the money for his personal use, Taylor said, "It costs a lot of money to serve" in the House and noted that he had traveled home almost every weekend. "I might convert some of it back to pay for expenses." Members are entitled to 32 paid round trips to their home districts a year.

The year-end report that Taylor's campaign committee filed with the FEC last week shows that he spent $7,000 in the last six months, including $3,189 in campaign contributions to other candidates and $500 to himself, labeled "petty cash." He still had $457,938.53 available for his personal use, earning interest in several bank accounts.

Former representative Bill Chappell (D-Fla.), who was defeated after his name was raised in connection with the Pentagon procurement scandal, reported "personal disbursements" to himself in December of $7,995.60. He has nearly $43,000 in campaign funds left.

Retired representative Sam Stratton (D-N.Y.), who has $180,000 in campaign funds available, was more direct in discussing his plans. "When you walk away from a job that pays $89,500, you have to feed your family," he said. "I have no financial holdings. I've got zilch, except in a couple of banks. So we're going to have to live on something. Fortunately, that provides a little pad."

Although he did not mention it, Stratton also has his congressional pension. According to an estimate by David Keating of the National Taxpayers' Union, Stratton's 30 years in the House, plus several more years in the military and other government service, should earn him a starting annual pension of around $64,000.

A provision to repeal the grandfather clause permitting personal use of campaign funds after leaving office is expected to be considered in a legislative package to be brought up after the pay raise takes effect Wednesday. But the proposal to repeal this loophole would not go into effect until after the current 101st Congress, allowing members who want to keep their money to retire and collect it. Two House members, Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) and Stephen J. Solarz (D-N.Y.), each have more than $1 million in campaign funds they could convert to their own use under the rule.

A federal pension plan that puts members of Congress and their staffs in the same "high-risk" category as federal firefighters, air traffic controllers and FBI and CIA agents. The rationale was that members and their staffs, who write the pension law, should get a sweeter pension because they face job insecurities every election cycle. However, in the House at least, a member running for reelection during the 1988 cycle had about as slight a chance of dying in office as being defeated.

According to the old system, under which most of those retiring this cycle earned benefits, the formula let lawmakers and their staff members accrue pension benefits at 2.5 percent times their highest pay times the number of years served. The highest rate for the rest of the civil service is 2 percent. Members and their staffs contribute 8 percent of their pay to the retirment plan, compared to 7 percent for executive branch workers.

The maximum congressional annual pension for those who retired this year is $71,600. If the proposed pay raise goes into effect, the most senior members serving two more terms will see their annual pensions jump to at least $108,000, and future cost-of-living increases will push that number higher.

The only way a member of Congress can lose his or her pension is to be convicted of treason. Felony convictions can cause a member to be expelled but not to lose the pension. Senior members convicted in the "Abscam" bribery scandal in 1980—such as former senator Harrison J. Williams (D-N.J.) and former representative Frank Thompson (D-N.J.)—now are receiving pensions. Keating estimated Thompson's pension at $60,413 a year and Williams' at $48,729.

Defenders of the system point out that the generous congressional pension still pales in comparison to the benefits under the military pension system.

Buying furniture from a congressional district office at fire-sale prices. This little-noticed House practice allows members to buy furniture at 10 percent to 50 percent of its cost, depending on the furniture's age. One member was set to buy leather chairs for $4.80 each, couches for $23 and mahogany desks for $60. The House clerk's office said the low prices were based on a General Services Administration schedule of depreciated furniture. Twenty of 27 members retiring from the 100th Congress took advantage of this.

St Germain's purchases from his Rhode Island office left his successor, Rep. Ron Machtley (R-R.I.), holding the first meeting in his district office standing up with seven visitors because all the chairs had been removed.

In the Senate, however, the practice is different. Senators who leave must pay "replacement cost" for furniture, according to Elliott Carroll, executive assistant to the architect of the Capitol. For example, the price for a senator's chair was $325 and his desk $800. Carroll said one senator, whom he declined to name, purchased his chair.

Lobbying. In another area where Congress treats itself differently from the rest of the government, there are no prohibitions against retired or defeated lawmakers lobbying their former colleagues. President Ronald Reagan vetoed a bill that would have extended the ban to the Congress for the first time, but this year's crop of retirees would not have been covered by the measure had it become law.

Thus, St Germain will be returning to Washington as a lawyer for a Rhode Island firm. He could not be reached for comment on whether his new duties will include lobbying former colleagues. Taylor, Stratton and retired representative Robert E. Badham (R-Calif.) said in interviews that they plan to do some Washington consulting.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 360. A bill to amend the Federal Deposit Insurance Act to provide deposit insurance in a manner which does not discriminate against small- and medium-sized banks by expanding the assessment base and reducing the assessment rate for deposit insurance; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

FAIR DEPOSIT INSURANCE ASSESSMENT ACT

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I also have legislation that I am introducing today that I call the Fair Deposit Insurance Assessment Act. Certainly, it is appropriate today at a time when we are talking about the problems of the S&L industry, and possibly the banking industry, to consider this as one small piece of the puzzle toward the solution of the problem.

This act, if enacted, would assess foreign deposit insurance premiums, comparable to FDIC. They would have to pay FDIC premiums. Right now they do not. So we have very large banks, the largest in the country, which has significant amount of foreign deposits who do not pay insurance premiums on those foreign deposits. I find that to be inequitable because actually we have had the FDIC which has made sure that the big banks do not fail and that all the depositors are made whole. In other words, they receive the insurance benefits, and the Federal Government stands behind the large banks, but foreign deposits do not pay the insurance. Domestic deposits pay the insurance.

The purpose of this bill would be to require that foreign deposits pay the insurance assessment just like domestic deposits do as well.

I think it is only fair. I think it is only equitable. The way we would do this is it could be done in a couple of ways. It was estimated that it would raise something like $405 million in 1991. The way I have crafted this bill is we would take the assessments on foreign deposits and use that to reduce the assessment or the insurance amount on domestic deposits. This would actually reduce the insurance fee which right now is being debated to be increased. But it actually reduces that on domestic deposits by about 1.2 basis points.

Mr. President, I hope we will be successful in passing this. We did pass it in 1987 when we were considering other legislation. Now that we are on legislation dealing strictly with FDIC, I am hopeful we will be able to pass this. We passed it by almost a 2-to-1 vote in the Senate then. I am hopeful and optimistic that we will this year as well.

To reiterate, I am introducing the Fair Deposit Insurance Assessment Act to correct an inequity in the method employed by FDIC to assess insurance premiums on deposits in U.S. banks. This is identical to legislation I introduced last session. Essentially, my bill requires the FDIC to begin assessing premiums on foreign deposits held by U.S. banks.

Currently, U.S. commercial banks pay one-half of 1 percent, or 8.3 basis points, for deposits insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation [FDIC]. As my colleagues and a growing number of Americans are aware. President Bush recently proposed increasing commercial banks' deposit insurance assessment to approximately 15 basis points in a move to bolster the FDIC insurance fund to 125 percent of insured deposits.

With my legislation, by equitably requiring insurance assessments of foreign deposits in U.S. commercial banks, we can reduce the deposits insurance assessment on commercial banks throughout the country by more than 1 basis point. Although this should never be painted as economic salvation for an industry, this measure certainly represents potential good news for bankers faced with possible increased assessments.

The Senate acted upon this idea in 1986 during consideration of the fiscal year 1987 budget reconciliation. We voted 63 to 32 to assess all deposits of U.S. banks, domestic and foreign. At that time CBO estimated assessing foreign deposits would result in revenues of $350 million in fiscal year 1989, $375 million in fiscal year 1990, and $405 million fiscal year 1991, and so on.

It seems the distinction between domestic and foreign deposits goes back to 1933 when the FDIC was created. Certainly, the amount of foreign deposits within the United States in 1933 pales in comparison to foreign deposits in the United States today.

Yet, FDIC insurance supports these deposits even though they are not sharing in the cost. They are getting a free ride. And the rest of the banking industry is doing the carrying. Smaller and medium-sized banks across the country are paying the cost of FDIC insurance for big banks with large foreign deposits. This is not equitable.

Unfortunately, the Senate's 1986 action did not clear the conference committee. However, it demonstrates the will of this body to correct a glaring loophole that is requiring smaller, ailing banks to prop up the foreign assets of money center lenders. Given the increased focus on deposit insurance assessments, I think this effort can and will be successful. It is my intention to pursue this measure as legislation dealing with the savings and loan industry progresses.

Quite frankly, the largest banks in the United States are not paying their fair share of the premiums into the insurance fund of the FDIC. These larger banks have been shown to benefit the most from FDIC insurance.

Community bankers in my State have argued for this change for years and it is about time we do something about it. My legislation offsets the added revenue from the assessment of the foreign deposits with a reduction of the deposit insurance rate from one-twelfth of 1 percent to one-fourteenth of 1 percent or, from approximately 8.3 basis points to 7.1 basis points, a reduction of nearly 1.2 basis points. Should the annual assessment rate increase as has been proposed, it is my intention to afford an equal reduction from the new assessment rate by applying increased revenues from the foreign deposit assessments.

I am sure my colleagues will agree that this change is needed to promote equity within our banking insurance system; their cosponsorship is welcomed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

S. 361. A bill to provide the additional support necessary to maintain an adequately funded and fully participatory U.S. role in the International Tropical Timber Organization; to the Commmittee on Foreign Relations.

U.S. PARTICIPATION IN THE INTERNATIONAL TROPICAL TIMBER ORGANIZATION

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to keep America's commitment as an active player in the International Tropical Timber Organization.

Everyday, thousands of acres of tropical forest are destroyed. And as the forest disappears, we lose our main environmental ally and manager. The Earth's tropical forests are parents to our present and forebearers of our future. They sustain our biological diversity and protect our global climate. Without their continued presence, life as we know it would cease. Simply put, our future must be a forested one. In order to assure this future the United States must be an active player. And in order to be a player we must pay our dues. Currently we are not. We have consistently underfunded our international role in the Tropical Timber Organization and we are in danger of having decisions that affect our future made for use.

Tropical forest destruction takes place for a myriad of reasons—and clearing for new cattle ranches, road building for territorial expansion, and for the actual harvesting of the timber itself. Virtually every country produces or uses timber from the tropical regions of the Earth. Unfortunately, timber harvesting and marketing are progressing in a wholly unsustainable manner. Of the 828 million hectares of productive tropical forest, less than 1 million hectares are being managed in a sustainable fashion.

Mr. President, the unsustainable destruction and use of tropical forests is a fact—a well-known fact that has received attention and money. And the United States has been a world leader in pushing for proper forest management. Today our influence and efforts are in danger of being eliminated due to continued fiscal shortsightedness. In 1983 we drafted, sponsored and signed the International Tropical Timber Agreement of 1983. This agreement established the International Tropical Timber Organization to help promote cooperation between producers and consumers of tropical timber. We were a charter member of this organization that gained support from nations worldwide. The continued existence of a U.S. role in this organization is vital. Unfortunately the United States has not come up with its dues and now risks losing a voice in shaping international forest policy.

U.S. dues are currently paid from a contingencies account—a vastly oversubscribed fund which supports United States participation in a number of international organizations. Approval of this legislation would permit funding from the conventions and international organizations account, where adequate funding is more likely to be available.

At a time when we are pondering the valuable investment of large sums of money for the prevention of global warming, it is inconceivable to not support one of the very organizations that has a chance to implement sustainable resource use.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I rise to join the Senator from Pennsylvania in supporting legislation urging the President to maintain U.S. membership in the International Tropical Timber Organization.

We are in the midst of a world environmental crisis, Mr. President. One of the most important challenges in addressing that crisis is the preservation of tropical forests.

As a major importer of tropical timber products, the United States has an obligation to support the efforts of the International Tropical Timber Organization to encourage sound forest management, conservation, and reforestation. If we are going to be an active member of ITTO, the United States needs to find a way to pay its dues. This bill does just that.

The survival of the rain forests depends in part on the economic vitality of developing countries. The ITTO is important for timber producing and consuming nations alike. I congratulate the Senator from Pennsylvania on this initiative.

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ROTH, and Mr. RIEGLE):

S. 362. A bill to promote intergovernmental and interagency cooperation in the development of ground water policy; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

GROUND WATER POLICY

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to manage and protect our Nation's ground water. In 1988, the Senate considered and passed a similar bill, S. 1992. This measure is almost identical to the previous bill, but with important technical amendments.

One thing that has not changed in the past year is the urgency of the legislation. Ground water is our life blood. It affects all our lives, and once contaminated, is difficult, often impossible, to clean. Today, the Senate again has an opportunity to enact legislation that will ensure proper management and protection of this invaluable resource.

Critically important, ground water provides drinking water for more than 50 percent of all Americans and nearly all for rural residents. It meets 40 percent of our irrigation needs. It maintains stream flows in dry weather and nourishes countless ecosystems.

Fortunately, ground water is in abundant supply, constituting 96 percent of the world's total water resources, Our Nation alone has 15 quadrillion gallons, stored a half-mile under the surface, equal to 35 years' worth of all surface water runoff, or 400 times our annual use. And the amount we use daily, 95 billion gallons, is largely replaced through precipitation.

But while we need not worry about the quantity of our ground water, we do need to be concerned about its quality. And there are serious problems in ground water management. We in the Governmental Affairs Committee have learned that intergovernmental and interagency cooperation is essential. States have primary responsibility for ground water management and protection, and yet must deal with a dozen competing Federal agencies and over a dozen Federal statutes to carry out their programs.

One witness, testifying before Senator SASSER'S subcommittee last session, told us that accessing Federal assistance is a hit or miss proposition. Another witness stated that when asked how well the existing ground water system works, he must reply "what system?"

While different layers of management try to sort themselves out, Mr. President, our constituents suffer. Across the country, virtually every aspect of modern life threatens ground water purity. Prevention, now, is far preferable to managing the damage later.

Mr. President, no one will dispute the urgent need for a comprehensive, national ground water policy. A large part of the problem entails communications, both among the involved Federal agencies, and between these agencies and those who have hands-on involvement with the resource—the State and local program operators.

The intergovernmental and interagency coordination provisions in this measure will reverse the miscommunication, policy and program overlaps, and general duplication of efforts that have characterized the management and protection of the Nation's ground water resource.

The legislation I am introducing today provides for the establishment of both an interagency committee on ground water management and protection and an advisory committee. These coordinative bodies will ensure that the Federal agencies with ground water concerns will both communicate among themselves about ground water policies and programs, and with the States and other interested parties. This avenue for State and local input is essential to the process, Mr. President, since only then can we be sure that Federal policies and regulations are best serving the public.

I urge my colleagues to enact this worthy legislation into statute in the near future. We cannot delay further.

By Mr. BOND:

S. 363. A bill to amend title 18 of the United States Code to stiffen the penalties for bank fraud; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

STIFFER PENALTIES FOR BANK FRAUD

Mr. BOND. Madam President, today I am reintroducing legislation which stiffens the penalties for defrauding a financial institution. I introduced this legislation in the 100th Congress and everything I have read since adjournment has convinced me that this legislation should be a priority in the 101st Congress. I am pleased to be joined by my colleagues, Senators DIXON, DANFORTH, DURENBERGER, GRAMM, MACK, KASSEBAUM, and SHELBY. The inflammatory headlines about the extent of the losses at the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation have focused Congress' attention on how to fix this problem to ensure that it never happens again. I am very disturbed about that percentage of the FSLIC's losses that are caused by out-and-out fraud. Certainly, many of the problems have been caused by economic decline in the Southwest, but there have been some flamboyant and outrageous cases of fraud. I am delighted that the administration shares this point of view and has included tough fraud and enforcement provisions in its proposed thrift plan.

It reflects badly on our entire financial system when a few unscrupulous individuals are able to use federally insured deposits as private slush funds. A recent report by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency on the reasons for bank failures states that "insider abuse and fraud were significant factors in the decline of more than one-third of the failed and problem banks the OCC evaluated." A preliminary draft of a General Accounting Office study of the reasons for bank and thrift failures reports that criminal misconduct was present in 19 of the 26 thrift failures studied and that repeated and extensive violations of Bank Board regulations and statutes occurred at all 26 institutions.

A House Government Operations Committee report said: "Serious misconduct by senior insiders or outsiders has caused, has contributed to, or was present in the insolvencies of most banks, savings and loans and credit unions * * * at least one-third—and probably more—of commercial bank failures and over three quarters of all S&L insolvencies appear to be linked in varying degrees to such misconduct." There has been some dispute about these figures, but it is certain that fraud has played a significant role in increasing the losses to the deposit insurance funds. In 1987, the FBI conducted nearly 12,000 investigations of fraud and embezzlement at financial institutions.

After a financial institution fails, the FDIC or the FSLIC conducts an investigation of the causes of the failure. If there is reason to suspect criminal violations, the case is referred to the FBI for investigation and then to the Justice Department for prosecution. These cases tend to be very complex and difficult to prove and the investigations are time consuming. In recent years, the Justice Department has moved prosecutions of those involved with the failure on financial institutions up on its list of priorities. This move is entirely appropriate.

The Bush administration's proposal that $50 million of the money raised to close the insolvent S&L's be used to fund additional Justice Department prosecutions of bank fraud is a very positive step. Attorney General Thornburgh's announcement last week of a special Justice Department task force to combat securities and commodities fraud is also an encouraging signal.

These are positive steps, but I believe that more needs to be done. Congress needs to send a powerful message that white collar criminals who steal from insured financial institutions will face stiff punishment. The legislation I am introducing today increases the maximum penalty for defrauding a financial institution from 5 years and $10,000 to 10 years and $1,000,000. At the end of the last Congress, we approved legislation which increased the maximum penalties for insider trading to these levels, and it seems entirely appropriate to have similar penalties for an equally serious white collar crime. Certainly, these maximum penalties are not appropriate in all cases, but those who have looted banks or savings and loans to fund their lavish lifestyles deserve to be dealt with severely. The taxpayers stand behind the deposit insurance funds, and thus those who steal from financial institutions are ultimately stealing from us all. I have discussed this problem with Secretary Brady and am delighted that the administration also supports stiffer penalties for bank fraud.

In addition to this legislation, there may be other legislative or administrative remedies we should consider. Currently, there is an informal interagency working group on bank fraud comprised of the bank regulators, the FBI, and the Justice Department. It might be helpful to give this group a formal legislative mandate to emphasize the importance that Congress places on interagency cooperation in the prosecution of bank fraud. In addition, prosecutors should be encouraged to ask for prison sentences in bank fraud cases as well as fines and restitution.

Congress should not recapitalize the FSLIC without taking steps to ensure that it will never be necessary again. There are many structural reforms of the deposit insurance system that the Banking Committee should consider, but it is also important to send the message that we will not condone those losses to the insurance fund that are caused by fraud. A slap on the wrist and a short jail term are not enough punishment for those whose illegal wheeling and dealing are going to cost the taxpayers billions.

Madam President, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a copy of the legislation and a series of articles outlining the dimensions of this problem.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 363

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1344(a) of title 18, United States Code, is amended by striking "shall be fined not more than $10,000, or imprisoned not more than five years, or both" and inserting "shall be fined not more than $1,000,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both".

[From American Banker, Aug. 12, 1988]

CRIME DOESN'T PAY—EXCEPT WHERE CERTAIN BANKERS ARE CONCERNED

(By Irvine Sprague)

WASHINGTON.—Quick now. Name 20 bank chairmen or presidents who went to jail in the past 20 years. I'm talking about top managers who defrauded the stockholders and customers who had trusted them with their money—not tellers or bookkeepers or bank robbers.

The question is unfair. There aren't 20. At least I could not come up with that many after consulting my memories, augmented with library file searches by Len Samowitz of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and Lou Leventhal of the American Banker.

Another question: How many convicted bankers served their full sentence? The answer, of course, is none. We all know that. Time off for good behavior and a change of heart by the sentencing judge almost always reduce the sentence.

Two flagrant examples. A prominent banker who stole millions was sentenced to five years in prison but stayed out on appeal for more than 10 years and finally served only eight months in a cushy outdoor job at a country club prison. A banker's son, given a 20-year sentence for securities fraud in 1982, already is out on the street.

The odds are that if you mismanage a megabank into the ground you won't go to jail and you won't pay for restitution. The stockholders take care of that for you. For it is the stockholders who pay for the directors' and officers' liability policies, which in turn pay for the mismanagement liabilities that often run into millions of dollars.

(Space is much too limited to go into the proliferation of savings and loan crooks who have had a wonderful time during these carefree deregulation years.)

BAD MANAGEMENT AND FRAUD

Comptroller Robert L. Clarke recently released a study showing that inept management has been the primary cause of bank failures, and that fraud often was a tool used by bad managers. FDIC Chairman L. William Seidman has testified that fraud was involved in at least one-third of all bank failures in 1986, 1987 and 1988.

With hundreds of bank failures in the past two decades and fraud a major cause, why the shortage of jail sentences? I guess the answer is threefold:

1. The Justice Department is asleep, or inept, or underfinanced. (The American Banker on July 28 reported an epidemic of bank fraud in the central district of California at the same time the major fraud division staffing there was cut more than 30%. Blame Ronald Regan, Edwin Meese, James C. Miller.)

2. Bank fraud is one of the most difficult crimes to prove to the satisfaction of a jury.

3. White collar crime pays.

This treatise was prompted by the guilty pleas of William Patterson of Penn Square Bank and John Lytle of Continental Illinois National Bank and Trust Company of Chicago, representatives of the two most flamboyant bank failures in history. Mr. Patterson and Mr. Lytle are to be sentenced Aug. 30. (I count Continental Illinois as a bank failure because it was. The FDIC annual report for 1987 continues the myth that it was not a failure by omitting it from the list of the 10 largest failures in history.)

The Patterson and Lytle cases are classic examples of how not to provide quick retribution and prompt justice. The guilty pleas came six years to the day after Penn Square failed.

The surfacing Square failed.

The surfacing of the story after six years brought back memories of that Fourth of July weekend as we spent three long days in Paul A. Volcker's cramped office deciding what to do about Penn Square.

Recent accounts attempt to rewrite the history of that weekend. I guess I should set the record straight. Comptroller Todd Conover was concerned, correctly, that if he closed Penn Square and we paid it off there would be multiple, unknown fallout, probably including fatal damage to Seattle-First National Bank, Continental Illinois, and other banks. William Isaac, then chairman of the FDIC, was concerned, correctly, that if we saved Penn Square the concept of deposit insurance would become a farce.

REGAN'S RACE ROLE WAS "MUSH"

The role of Mr. Volcker was to advocate doing nothing that would disrupt the system. The role of Treasury Secretary Donald Regan was mush. Mr. Volcker called Mr. Regan to meet with us on July 4. He listened to our problem but clearly did not want to get involved. As he left, he said: "Well, I'm sure you gentlemen will do the right thing."

All five people involved have tremendous egos. I'm sure each, in his own mind, dominated the discussion and made the decision. Mr. Volcker and Mr. Regan could talk. Mr. Conover, Mr. Isaac and I had to vote. With Mr. Isaac and Mr. Conover headed in different directions, I had to decide which way we would go. To me, It was simple: we simply could not bail out Penn Square with its trail of greed and dishonesty. In the end, the vote to let Penn Square take its lumps was 3 to 0.

Enough of that. Back to the jail sentences. Let me refresh your memories. Think of Silverthorne, Sindona, Smith, Butcher, and who else?

Let us call the roll of the pitifully small handful of bankers identified as having served prison sentences:

Michele Sindona tops the list with a 25-year prison sentence in 1980 for fraud and perjury, a sentence that the American Banker then described as the longest ever meted out for white-collar crime.

Mr. Sindona masterminded the Franklin National Bank downfall and his story is fascinating. Before sentencing he disappeared for a time, returning with a tale about being kidnapped. Extradited to Italy, he was given a 15-year prison senence for fraud and then sentenced to life for murder. A week later, in 1986, he died in prison. Some say he was poisoned, others that he committed suicide. A third version is that it was stroke-induced, a natural death.

(A footnote to the Sindona case. Last month the National Archives gave the FDIC permission to destroy the Franklin files: more than 6,000 filing cabinets filled with 700 tons—yes, tons—of paper.)

C. Arnholt Smith is my second favorite bank crook. Mr. Smith, whose domain included U.S. National Bank in San Diego, in 1975 pleaded no contest to charges he defrauded the bank of $170 million. The short, suspended sentence he received in federal court was variously attributed to his age, his illness, or more likely, his powerful political connections.

In a separate tax evasion charge, he received a five-year sentence from a state court for grand theft but he stayed out of the slammer for 10 years with repeated appeals. Finally, he did serve eight months as a gardener is a county work center. (The FDIC is still trying to dispose of some of the garbage loans he bequeathed us.)

Jake Butcher, C.H. Butcher, and Jesse Barr. I must discuss Mr. Barr first. Convicted of defrauding Union Planters Bank of $17 million in 1976, he received a five-year sentence but was released after 11 months. UPI reported at the time that the release came after a letter to the judge in which Mr. Barr said: "I've truly seen that crime does not pay." Later, Mr. Barr was picked up by the Butcher brothers and was an adviser during the looting of United American Bank and other Butcher institutions. Jake and C.H. both received 20-year prison sentences, Mr. Barr 18 years, and C.H.'s wife, Shirley, three years.

Don C. Silverthorne was the first bank crook whose damage I officially encountered. When I joined the FDIC in 1968 we were busily involved in sorting out the junk portfolio he left at San Francisco National Bank. (It took just over 20 years after the failure to finally close the books on San Francisco National.) Mr. Silverthorne took the bank to the cleaners before it failed in 1965. He finally spent some time at the McNeill Island federal prison. My longtime assistant, Alan Miller, recalls that Mr. Silverthorne's first conviction was overturned on the grounds there was so much publicity that a fair trial was impossible. He was convicted in a second trial and sentenced.

Here are some other former bankers whose sentences bolster the point that while crime may pay off, it does have its risks:

Harry D. Vestal, City and County Bank of Campbell County, Jellico, Tenn., four years.

John A. Bodziak, Florida Center Bank, 10 years.

Tommy Ballard, The Bank of Woodson, Tex., three years.

Sam Spikes, Far West Financial Corp., Tex., 10 years.

Henry Earl Fagan, Guaranty State Bank, Redwater, Tex., eight years.

Douglas, Adams, First Security Bank of North Arkansas, Horseshoe Bend, Ark., two years.

Anthony B. Angelos, Des Plaines Bank, Des Plaines, Ill., five years.

Gary Miller, First National Bank of Carrington, N.D., five years.

John Vergo, Midtown National Bank of Pueblo, Colo., two years.

W.R. Smith, Sr., Citizen Bank of Tillar, Ark., three years.

Byron Phillips, Aquia Bank and Trust Co., Stafford, Va., three years.

Richard R. Saccone, Mohawk Bank and Trust Co. of Greenfield, Mass., two years.

While the incidence of jail sentences is low, the volume of civil suits is rising both in number and volume. In 1987 there were 40 judgments that returned $59 million to the FDIC. The civil suits expose and disgrace those caught up in them, but often times they do not touch their pocketbooks. Two examples:

At Seafirst, there was a consent judgment against chairman William Jenkins and other top bank officials in an amount exceeding $100 million, the judgment to be paid solely by the insurance carriers.

Last month, the suit against the carriers was settled and the results sealed. Bank of America, owner of Seafirst, then announced a $46 million addition to its bottom line, so it is fair to assume that was the settled amount.

CONTINENTAL MAY SET RECORD

The all-time high settlement may come from Continental Illinois, and that is appropriate for the all-time record bank failure. Chairman Roger Anderson, president John Perkins, and other top officers agreed to settlements totaling $88 million, to be paid solely by the insurance carriers. The insurance was staggered, carried in differing degrees by several companies. Some settlements have been reached, others are pending, and whatever is left will go to trial in November.

In a category all by himself is Stanford S. Stoddard of Michigan National. Accused of misusing bank funds for his personal pleasures, including paying for his daughter's wedding reception, Mr. Stoddard was assessed a $146,000 penalty by an administrative law judge.

Comptroller Clarke let Stoddard off in a ruling that reminds one of Alice in Wonderland: "Although Mr. Stoddard flagrantly misused bank funds, the bank's expenditures . . . do not constitute extensions of credit. Accordingly, the civil money penalty shall not be assessed."

Separately, Mr. Stoddard was convicted in a criminal trial and sentenced to three years. He remains free on appeal.

In most cases, where fraud or negligence is involved, suit is filed against a number of culpable bank officers. The usual pattern is for most of their insurers to settle. Others go to civil trial.

Two cases this year indicate the pattern. In FDIC v. Bruce A. Bryan (Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Hennessy, Okla.), a jury returned a $3.3 million verdict against two inside directors. In FDIC v. Rex Niver (First State Bank of Thayer, Kan.), a jury found against two defendant directors in amounts of $860,000 and $255,000.

Last year, a judge handed down a $865,000 judgment in FDIC v. Craig Caldwell (Western National Bank of Santa Ana, Calif.)

How to end a column like this, one prompted by the guilty pleas of Mr. Patterson and Mr. Lytle, two who looted their banks? My preference would be to say that white-collar crime does not pay. Under the circumstances I'll just have to be silent. The Wall Street Journal recently said what we need is a sufficient demonstration that bankers are to be held accountable for their mistakes.

LOAN STARS FALL IN TEXAS

(By Bill Powell and Daniel Pedersen)

Donald R. Dixon, it seemed, always knew the right thing to say, the right face to put on, the right image to convey. Whatever role he needed to play to get what he wanted he played brilliantly, and in the spring of 1981 he sat in a house by Lake LBJ in the gently rolling hills of central Texas and played the prodigal son. He sat and spoke reverently of the town in which he was raised. Vernon, Texas, about 200 miles northwest of Dallas, is a town notable only for its wholesome familiarity. There is a single town square, several churches, three banks and two small savings associations. Of the two, Vernon Savings & Loan was the biggest. Many local workers—like those who stitch Boy Scout uniforms at a plant just outside town—deposited their paychecks there and took loans to buy their modest homes. Dixon, a successful developer in Dallas by his mid-30s, told banker R. B. Tanner, sitting in his hill country home, about his desire "to return to my roots."

He had loved Vernon as a boy, he said, growing up the affluent son of the local newspaper owner and popular radio personality, W. D. Dixon. Now, he said earnestly, he wanted to give something back to the community. He wanted to buy the thrift Tanner owned—Vernon Savings & Loan Association. Tanner, then 65 and ready to pass on a business he'd run for more than 20 years, says Dixon assured him that there would be few changes, and that suited Tanner fine. He had been a Depression-era bank examiner in rural Texas, and he ran his thrift with a rigid discipline born of that experience. Only a fraction of Vernon Savings' loan portfolio was in default when he turned his majority stake over in exchange for a down payment and a $1.75 million balloon note. Tanner agreed to sell, he says, because Dixon had "painted us a real pretty picture."

Next month the note was to have been paid off completely, and though Tanner would never admit it, he probably will never see a dime. Don Dixon filed for personal bankruptcy in the spring of 1987, shortly after the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp. took over an insolvent Vernon Savings. FSLIC found more than 90 percent of its loans were delinquent, and soon afterward filed a $540 million civil suit—its largest ever—against Dixon and six other Vernon Savings officers, charging them with fraud and self-dealing during their five-year run at the top of the S&L. Sources close to the case believe the Justice Department, whose investigation into thrift fraud in Texas dwarfs its inquiry into Wall Street's insider-trading scams, will file similar charges shortly.

Back in 1981 there was no hint of the economic cyclone that would soon hit Texas with stunning force, putting an end to a riotous boom that many thought would last for a long, long time. Dixon certainly thought so, and so did many of the people running the thrifts in the state. There was a revolution under way in the Texas S&L industry, propelled by coming deregulation and a real-estate boom, and men like Don Dixon were in the vanguard. So too was his friend Tyrell (Terry) Barker a general contractor from California who, some months before Dixon had also approached Tanner about buying Vernon Savings. Tanner had turned him down, but Barker, for the same reasons that motivated Dixon, was determined to buy a thrift.

SERIOUS MONEY

To Dixon and Barker—and the many like them in Texas in the early 1980s—the allure of the thrifts was obvious. They offered the tantalizing prospect of serious money. Starting in 1982, Washington cut loose what was a tightly regulated, sleepily managed business. Regulators allowed thrifts to pay any amount of interest they wanted to attract deposits—and the thrifts loaned them out more aggressively than every before.

The business soon attracted real-estate men with the instinct of gamblers. They paid high rates and then turned around and poured the money right back into the blistering real-estate market. By far the biggest shot at earning millions, they saw, came from their ability to get a piece of every deal the thrifts would finance. In return for a loan, S&L's could now ask for a chunk of the proceeds from the sale of a developed property.

MAIN MAN

Dixon and Barker were very interested in getting rich quick. One of Barker's business ventures after coming to Texas in 1980 was a development partnership called MLMQ number 1—"Make Lots of Money Quick." Thanks to the surge in real estate prices in California, Barker had done reasonably well. But when he arrived in Texas he didn't have enough money to buy even a small S&L, so Dixon introduced Barker to Herman K. Beebe Sr. Beebe owned AMI Inc., a diversified company with interests in nursing homes, motels and insurance. But in the early '80s, Beebe started bankrolling people who wanted a piece of the thrift action in Texas. "Herman was the man to see," says a former thrift regulator.

Dixon's introduction of Barker to Beebe in 1981 began what one FSLIC investigator calls the tale of "the godfather and the two sons." Dixon had known Beebe since the mid-1970s, and he frequently borrowed from a Houston S&L that Beebe controlled. Beebe helped Dixon purchase Vernon Savings. In truth, the emotional reasons for the purchase that Dixon had to eloquently described to R. B. Tanner had little to do with the deal, says Dale Anderson, the former president of AMI and long Beebe's closest associate. To Beebe, Dixon played the more realistic role of a let's-get-the-deal-done businessman, and Beebe warmed to him. Dixon bought Vernon Savings mainly because it was the easiest to finance. When Dixon brought Barker to Beebe, Beebe again didn't hesitate. Contractor Barker didn't have a whit of banking experience ("When I knew him in California," says a former colleague, "he wore dirty clothes and pounded nails"), but he got $880,000 from Beebe to buy State Savings and Loan in Lubbock, Texas.

From that point on, the three lives were linked inextricably. Each man in the next few years earned millions financing Texas real-estate deals. But each also crashed in a heap, victims of a heady era not unlike that which soon followed on Wall Street—one in which making big money fast was the highest priority, no matter how it was done. Barker last year was convicted of fraud and is serving five years in a federal penitentiary in Fort Worth. Herman Beebe, having pleaded guilty to two felony charges (for wire fraud and conspiracy) will join him there shortly, serving a scheduled sentence of a year and a day. Beebe is also now cooperating with the Justice Department's probe of Dixon, who of the three flew the highest and fell the farthest. He has been accused by FSLIC of "looting, dissipating and wasting Vernon's assets," and has yet to respond formally to the allegations.

After getting their S&L's in 1981, Dixon and Barker were living high and making millions, with no prospect that things would soon change. They both expanded small branch offices their thrifts had in Dallas and turned them into executive offices. The small-town pace of Vernon and Lubbock had no allure for two relatively young men trying to make millions. Occasionally Dixon visited Beebe's modern mansion just outside Shreveport. The two also traveled together frequently, playing gin and drinking bourbon on the plane, with the younger Dixon referring to Beebe by the grandfatherly nickname of "Papaw." And from 1982 to 1984 says a former Barker associate, "Terry and Beebe were on the phone to each other all the time."

PACKAGE DEALS

Their bond was money. Says U.S. Attorney Joe Cage, who prosecuted Beebe twice: "Beebe created Barker and Dixon for his benefit, their benefit, everybody's benefit but the American taxpayer. It worked great for awhile." Beebe started financing savings and loan associations, allowing him to sell more of AMI's credit life insurance. According to Anderson and FSLIC investigators who have looked into Dixon's affairs at Vernon, Dixon was adept at peddling AMI's insurance to the S&L's borrowers. Anderson said a $200,000 loan was often offered with a $200,000 credit life policy. "We were very careful about how we worded it," he says. "If a borrower said he'd talk to his own insurance man, we'd say, 'Fine. That's probably where you need to get your loan'." In two years, according to Anderson, AMI netted $2.5 million through Vernon's insurance sales.

The quid pro quos flirted with the outer limits of the law, and the practice foreshadowed far more questionable practices that would emerge later. Barker wasn't as adept selling Beebe's credit life policies through his S&L, State Savings, but he learned how to deal feverishly in the real-estate market. His motto was "If I rest, I rust," and part of his energy may have been fueled by a desire to overcome dyslexia. According to a psychologist's report filed at his trial last year, Barker reads only at the third-grade level.

DOGGIE POOL

His main passion outside of business, it seemed, was his two dogs—an English bulldog and a Labrador. He traveled almost everywhere with them, and in 1983 he built a miniature swimming pool just outside the sliding glass doors of his Dallas office so his pets could refresh themselves in the scalding summer heat.

Baker followed a simple business philosophy: "You bring the dirt, I bring the money. We split 50-50." Borrowers were not required to put any money of their own into their real-estate projects. All they had to do was give State Savings a 50 percent interest in the project. According to John Meyer, former president of the S&L, State Saving's standards for credit risk were, to say the least, tolerant. He recalls one customer who had worked for a lumberyard at $35,000 a year. "The next year, he's suddenly a general contractor with a construction loan of $1.5 million." In less than two year State Savings went from $50 million in assets to $750 million.

At Vernon Savings under Don Dixon, that was only cruising speed. At a party just after Dixon had bought the thrift, Woody Lemons, the institution's president under Tanner and then the CEO under Dixon, told Vernon Savings' employees that change was imminent. S&L's were now able to compete for funds with the money-center banks and anyone else, he said; Vernon Savings would be quick and it would take risks.

Founder R.B. Tanner learned quickly that he wasn't going to like the Dixonized version of Vernon. He had retained a seat on the board after the sale. Vernon insiders say that at the first directors' meeting he attended with the Don Dixon presiding, the new owner asked the board to approve the purchase of an expensive work of art, a bronze sculpture of an American Indian that cost $125,000. Tanner voted no, the purchase was approved and he later resigned from the board.

To the regulators in Washington and Austin—and to the new management—Tanner and his conservatism represented the stodgy, unimaginative ways of the past. In 1987 Dixon told the Dallas Times Herald that "the regulators were just thankful to have new flesh and blood foolish enough to invest in a dying industry.' (Through his attorneys Dixon refused repeated requests for interviews by NEWSWEEK, as did Barker and Beebe. In the past, one of Dixon's attorneys has denied fraud allegations.)

Dixon's Vernon Savings went after big deposits from institutional investors vigorously—money that was very sensitive to the slightest rate changes. From 1982 to 1986, Vernon accepted $1.7 billion in new deposits. Dixon also moved the S&L quickly into the booming financial-real-estate market for the first time. FSLIC . . . complaint alleges that . . . the start Vernon's loans were made just as Barker's had been at State Savings: "with intentional and reckless disregard . . . of the collectibility." A former customer says that Vernon had become, simply, "the lender of last resort."

Dixon, some associates say, would profess ignorance of the industry's regulations whenever federal or state regulators raised questions—as they did as early as 1983. Others say that was just another of his roles—this time the ignorant developer trying to learn the ways of a new business.

Though regulators had discouraged Dixon from dealing with Beebe, the two remained close at least until mid-1984. In the meantime, according to FSLIC's complaint, Dixon was in the process of setting up elaborate schemes to use Vernon for his own personal benefit. In April 1983 he set up a bewilderingly complex web of subsidiaries under a company called Dondi Financial Corp. He did so, in part, FSLIC alleges, to transfer some stock from one of Dondi's subsidiaries to Vernon. The net effect, FSLIC says, was to inflate Vernon's net worth. By so doing Dixon was allegedly able to increase dividend payments to the thrift's major shareholders without adding to its working capital, as bank-board regulations normally require. The biggest stockholder, of course, was Dixon himself.

TAKING OFF

FSLIC charges that was only the beginning; other alleged abuses soon followed. By October of 1983 Dixon had begun to live the rarefied life of a man with apparently limitless wealth, but he did it using Vernon's funds, according to FSLIC's complaint. Uncomfortable with commercial air travel, he bought a fleet of five planes for Vernon and leased two others. In three years, FSLIC says, Vernon Savings paid out close to $6 million in maintenance fees and operational costs on the fleet.

Perhaps that wasn't surprising, given how frequently Dixon and his wife, Dana, who ran her own interior-decorating firm, used the fleet. In October of 1983, for example, they flew off to Europe for a two-week trip that Dana entitled "Gastronomique Fantastique" in a diary she kept. For several days, Don and Dana Dixon and another couple fed themselves at seven different three-star European restaurants. Their trip had been arranged in part by international playboy Philippe Junot, former husband of Monaco's Princess Caroline. ("We . . . were truly into the adventure," . . . Dixon wrote, "when we were greeted . . . Philippe Junot's smiling face and his . . . immediate quick witticisms . . .")

GOURMET TRAVEL

Dixon's justification for these trips, associates say, is that he was traveling on business. Dana says he made a side trip during Gastronomique Fantastique to Switzerland, apparently to check on a European subsidiary that was to lure foreign capital to Vernon. Dixon's craving for the high life didn't stop at world travel. Some of his friends believe he became so impressed with Beebe and his lavish lifestyle—AMI owned a private jet and Beebe had a plush house in La Costa, Calif.—that Dixon was determined to "out-perk him." Dixon once told Beebe confidant Dale Anderson that a measure of a man's success was "the number of toys he had." In December 1984 Vernon Savings bought a $2 million beach house in Del Mar, Calif.—a transaction the board, according to FSLIC's suit, never approved. For the next year, FSLIC charges, the Del Mar house was Dixon's main residence, but he paid no rent. Occasionally he threw parties for Vernon executives and customers. A former construction manager for Dixon, Jack Brenner, says they were attended by attractive young women who, he alleges, were hired for the occasions. The ostensible reason for purchasing the luxurious beach house was to monitor Vernon's West Coast project—but Brenner insists "there was no damn business reason to come out."

In Texas the world had changed considerably by 1985. The oil bust had thrown the state into recession, and the relentless climb in real-estate prices stopped. But Beebe and Barker had made a lot of money for themselves when the going was good, despite the fact that Barker failed to sell much AMI credit insurance.

Beebe and Barker continued to cut each other in on deals, including one the government later prosecuted successfully. "Basically it all boiled down to back scratching," says Roger McRoberts, the U.S. attorney who prosecuted Barker. In 1983 Barker's State Savings loaned $4.4 million to Beebe and an unnamed partner to finance the purchase of a ranch in Foard County, near Vernon. After buying the ranch for $2.8 million in June 1983, Beebe and his partner asked for most of the remainder—$1.05 million—as "working capital."

The money was promptly wired to Beebe's Bossier Bank & Trust Co. in Bossier City, La. Beebe used some of the funds to retire an outstanding loan from Barker. But according to Anderson, $800,000 was split four ways—one part to Anderson, another to Beebe, another to a Texas rancher and the last quarter to Woody Lemons, Dixon's CEO at Vernon Savings. Lemons' attorney says his client received a payment of just over $19,000 and strongly insists the transaction was "legitimate." But a government investigator believes that Beebe's transaction will be the avenue the Justice Department will use to seek an indictment against Lemons and Dixon.

In 1984 FSLIC brought in a new chairman to replace Terry Barker at State Savings. A year after that Beebe and Anderson were convicted of defrauding the Small Business Administration—a scam apparently unrelated to Dixon or Barker. Dixon quickly distanced himself from his friend Beebe. And, FSLIC says, he began unloading loans made against what had since become wildly overpriced commercial properties. In desperation, in November 1986 he enlisted the aid of House Speaker Jim Wright to keep FSLIC from closing Vernon. But by then investigators knew just how bad things were and resisted. Soon after they moved in, Dixon, back in California, filed for bankruptcy.

At Barker's trial last year, one bank official who had met with the State Savings owner revealed that he once sat around his north Dallas office and described for friends the mechanics of how so many Texas properties got so inflated during the boom. Barker had elevated age-old "land-flipping" schemes into a fine honed craft. Flipping land meant getting appraisers to pin high values on properties, and Barker had no trouble arranging that. He knew several appraisers, he claimed, from whom he could get "any price" he wanted. Then he would get one of his "network" of financial institutions to buy the property—with a big loan from State Savings—and then flip the land over to the "next greater fool." On what Barker called the "Day of the Great Fool," some investor or bank would "take their lumps." Eventually "somebody winds up [with] the property and, of course, gets buried in it."

BUSTED DOWN

In Texas in the last three years, the burials have come with increasing frequency. More thrifts and banks have failed than at any time since the 1930s. Ben Barnes, Texas's former lieutenant governor, once sat on Herman Beebe's board at Bossier Bank & Trust and, with former governor John Connally, borrowed around $40 million from Vernon Savings (legally). Their partnership went bankrupt, as the bust punished big and small investors alike. "People don't realize," Barnes says, "that this was a full-blown regional depression."

No one knows how much outright fraud contributed to the great Texas thrift crisis and how much was simply attributable to plummeting oil and land prices. Undeniably, though, unscrupulous lending practices fueled much of the crash. Next week some of Donald R. Dixon's worldly possessions will go up for sale in a bankruptcy auction at his old Dallas home. The curious will pick over Chinese porcelain vases, expensive Oriental rugs and antique guns. It will be another small Texas burial, one that R.B. Tanner won't bother to attend.

[From Business Week, Oct. 31, 1988]

HIGH-ROLLING TEXAS: THE STATE THAT ATE FSLIC

In 1982, when Congress deregulated the savings and loan industry, nowhere were the cheers louder than in Texas. Thrifts there were enjoying a booming economy and a freewheeling regulatory environment. The new federal policy seemed likely to make things even more wide open. So begins a story about how an industry with bulging pockets can distort government policy.

For the next four years, Texas thrifts kept state regulators looking the other way despite clear evidence that many were spinning reckless deals. In 1983 and 1984, Texas even broadened S&L charters to make sure that state thrifts had an even freer hand in real estate development.

Local officials also kept the Federal Home Loan Bank Board from applying the brakes in Texas. At a Fort Worth town meeting in late 1986, real estate and thrift executives beseeched House Speaker Jim Wright (D-Tex.) to stop the FHLBB and its then-Chairman Edwin J. Gray. His regulators, they said, would ruin the state real estate industry.

Gray's critics, it turns out, had things backward. Texas eventually broke the FHLBB's Federal Savings & Loan Insurance Corp. With their influence in Washington, the state's S&Ls helped delay new funds for FSLIC for nearly one year out of fear that the money might be used to pay off depositors and shut them down. But now the cost is far higher: S&L losses keep rising because the FHLBB can't afford the $50 billion that some say it would take to close all the troubled Texas thrifts.

By contrast, keeping doors open in Washington and Austin came relatively cheap for the Texas thrift industry. Among other contributions, it anted up $2 million for the 1986 Republican primary for governor. And Speaker Jim Wright raised $240,000 for his 1986 campaign from thrifts and real estate interests—20% of his war chest, Business Week's tabulation shows.

WHO'S WHO

The House Ethics Committee is investigating Wright's involvement with the FHLBB, where he allegedly pressured regulators to go easy on Texas. Wright says he was only doing a legislator's job of representing his constitutents. Yet he wasn't the industry's only friend. Former Representative Thomas G. Loeffler, now Vice-President George Bush's campaign manager for Texas, solicited support from the Reagan Administration to name to the FHLBB an Austin lobbyist, Durward Curlee, whose client list was a virtual who's who of S&L high rollers. Loeffler says that he, too, was looking out for Texas interests.

For the thrift industry, it was mostly politics as usual—good ol' boys and political action committees exercising their rights in Washington. And the gospel of the day was: Thou shalt deregulate. Unfortunately, that deregulation came just as Texas real estate was in a frenzy.

A horde of newcomers moved in to take advantage of the state's liberal thrift rules—and few were typical bankers in pinstripes. When Harvey D. McLean, a Dallas developer and chairman of Paris Savings, reportedly attended a costume party with blue hair and wearing punk regalia, he joked to reporters that he dressed that way to visit his banker. Vernon Savings, an $83 million S&L when developer Don R. Dixon bought it in 1982, quickly acquired five airplanes and a helicopter, according to a FSLIC lawsuit.

McLean and Dixon raised few eyebrows. Curlee, the Austin lobbyist, saw nothing strange in thrift owners who liked fast transportation. Says Curlee, who was once executive director of the Texas Savings & Loan League: "That's not criminal. That's Texas."

The first crack in the industry's self-assurance came in 1984. Empire Savings of suburban Dallas, with assets of more than $300 million, collapsed. The thrift had grown seventeenfold in two years using what a 1988 federal grand jury indictment calls a scheme of land flips—successive sham sales of the same real estate at progressively higher prices. Empire's management and its developer associates pleaded not guilty, and their trial on conspiracy and fraud charges is about to begin in Lubbock. Closing Empire cost FSLIC $170 million.

That disaster galvanized Gray. He began a campaign to stomp out the brokers who supplied many fast-growing thrifts with large deposits or "hot money" in pursuit of top yields. He also wanted to curb the thrifts' new investment powers, and he replaced the head of the Dallas Home Loan Bank. The home loan banks have federal regulatory powers but are owned and run by regional S&Ls. Texans believed Gray wanted to re-regulate the whole industry, not just toss out the bad apples.

CRAZIES

Thrift examiners were overwhelmed in Texas. The Dallas bank had lost much of its staff after a 1983 move from Little Rock. And Texas had just 19 state examiners; their starting salary in 1983 was $13,000. Some S&Ls hadn't been examined for two years—an eternity for thrifts that were doubling in size annually. Gray says he asked the Reagan Administration for help. He recalls the answer from the "ideological crazies" at the Office of Management & Budget: "Deregulation meant getting government out of the industry."

Meanwhile, Curlee had left the Texas league. He began a new lobbying campaign, with the league and 20 of the most aggressive thrifts as his clients. They included Vernon, Sunbelt, and others since taken over by the FHLBB. In Washington, Curlee and his clients started calling on congressmen to oppose Gray's agenda. "We began hearing that a contingent of Texas thrifts was working to get Gray out of office," says Shannon Fairbanks, former FHLBB chief of staff.

Back in Austin, the Texas industry set out to show that it could clean its own house. Former state S&L Commissioner L. Linton Bowman III drafted a bill that would let state regulators seize an S&L without going to court. But he was frustrated at every turn. The bill was passed only after Bowman reached a private agreement with a thrift owner who figured he was the measure's intended target. Says Bowman: "I had to negotiate with people I didn't want to be in the same room with."

Part-time legislators, and the potential for conflicts of interest, are a fact of life for many state regulators. Stanley D. Schlueter, for example, was on the House committee overseeing the state S&L commission. A developer, he shared in a joint land deal with Lamar Savings, which later failed. Grant Jones served on the comparable Senate committee—as well as the board of Commodore Savings until the FHLBB took it over. When FSLIC took control of Vernon, on its list of delinquent loans was a 1984 loan for $75,000 to El Paso Senator H. Tati Santiesteban.

Schlueter denies any conflict. Jones says he sees no conflict since the committee passed no measures affecting individual S&Ls. Santiesteban says he got no preferential treatment.

In Washington, Curlee offered the FHLBB's Gray a deal. If the bank board would exempt Texas from reregulation, the state would reimburse FSLIC for its first $80 million in expenses in Texas each year. That bill sailed through the state legislature. But Gray dismissed it as inadequate, "a joke."

Gray had little else to laugh about. Texas S&L owners were making his life difficult. "It was a sport to call Ed Gray to your [congressional] office and jump his ass," says a state regulator. Opposing brokered deposits also put Gray in a pitched battle with Donald Regan, then White House chief of staff. Eventually, Attorney General Edwin Meese III asked Gray to resign. He was going to comply until Regan's staff crowed prematurely in an October, 1985, press leak. Gray dug in his heels.

Worried Texas thrifts next tried to get a friendly voice on the three-member FHLBB. Curlee asked Loeffler, who had close White House ties, to put him up for a vacancy in mid-1986. Curlee also asked former Texas congressman Kent Hance for help. Hance said that Curlee's clients made him "unappointable." But Hance also declined the seat himself. "I wasn't through with elective office," says Hance, now a Republican state railroad commissioner. "If you took that job, you would never be elected again."

STRATEGIES

Even though the politicians saw Curlee as a hired gun, they had other reasons to listen to the Texas thrift industry. Hance, who represented thrifts as an attorney, ran unsuccessfully for the Republican gubernatorial nomination in 1986 with major financing from the thrift industry. In the same primary, Vernon, other aggressive thrifts, and their developer associates ponied up $500,000 for Loeffler—some 10% of his campaign fund. A Vernon executive subsequently pleaded guilty to submitting false bills to the S&L for money that wound up in Loeffler's campaign. Federal proscecutors say the Loeffler campaign didn't know about the money's source. Says Loeffler: "There is no nexus" between his campaign funds and his support for the industry.

The high-flyers had another strategy. They chartered the High Spirits, a 110-foot sister ship of the former Presidential yacht Sequoia. The yacht, previously owned by Vernon's Dixon, soon became a popular Potomac haunt for thrift executives, legislators, and fundraisers. Thomas Gaubert, a developer and former owner of Independent American Savings, remembers the crew asking him to leave because Ed Meese was coming aboard, and they didn't think it appropriate for Gaubert, a Democratic fundraiser, to meet Meese. Now on trial in Des Moines on charges of defrauding an Iowa thrift, Gaubert describes himself as a Democratic alien in a mostly Republican industry.

Still, Curlee's clients weren't inhibited by party. In a 1985 special election Republicans in his group gave $50,000 to help Gaubert finance the congressional election of Jim Chapman, a Texas Democrat. Chapman's election was important to Speaker Wright, who wanted to stop Republican inroads in Texas.

By 1986 the Texas economy was unraveling and foreclosures were mounting. With the problems so clear, Gray finally made headway. To prevent thrifts from refinancing each other's bad loans, he rounded up 270 examiners from across the country for a statewide audit. Soon Gray was armed with tough appraisal rules that allowed him to challenge the thrifts' fancy accounting. He had the power to close any thrift in the state.

When Wright called Gray in October, the Speaker didn't want to hear the bank board version of problems at Gaubert's Independent American. Instead, Gray recalls, Wright told him: "Ed, I urge you to meet with Tom."

Gray needed legislation to strengthen FSLIC, so he appeased Speaker Wright by appointing an independent counsel to investigate Gaubert's complaints.

Don Dixon was Wright's next project. Over Christmas, Wright's staff tracked Gray down in San Diego to ask for time for Dixon to raise new capital at his struggling thrift, Vernon. "I told them if Dixon could find someone dumb enough" to invest, says Gray, "please go ahead and be my guest."

Gray struggled from November, 1986, until August, 1987, to win congressional assent to bolster FSLIC. Two Texas Republicans, Representative Steve Bartlett and Senator Phil Gramm, sponsored an amendment that would protect Texas S&Ls from unwarranted closures. "We didn't have the money or the staff," Gray says, "so forbearance was a reality anyway." Finally, Gray got the bill. When his term ended in June, 1987, he stepped down. At that point, falling oil prices had erased 40% of the state's real estate values. The thrifts now needed FSLIC and made peace with Gray's successor, M. Danny Wall. FHLBB had won.

OVERSUPPLY

The epilogue is just as disquieting as the tale. Wall is getting mixed reviews for his Southwest Plan. Because he can't afford massive liquidations, Texas will remain oversupplied with banks and thrifts for years. That's why private investors have offered only $360 million in new capital, compared with $16.4 billion pledged by FSLIC. And some may still be looking for the good old days to return. Says one potential investor: "Heads I win, tails FSLIC loses."

As for regulatory reform, a measure to raise the pay of state thrift examiners, who currently start at $18,500, died in committee in 1987. Now Governor William P. Clements proposes to control an S&L oversight board, the majority of whose members at present are industry insiders.

S&Ls will resist, says the Texas league, because of concerns about undue influence by politicians. But insiders vs. outsiders may be beside the point. After all, neither the regulators nor the regulated have covered themselves with glory.

By Mr. GORE:

S. 364. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to increase the amount of the earned income tax credit, to make the credit for dependent care expenses refundable, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVES ACT

EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVES ACT

Mr. GORE. Madam President, I am introducing legislation today which is simultaneously being introduced in the other body by Representative TOM DOWNEY of New York, Representative GEORGE MILLER of California, and Representative JOHN LEWIS of Georgia. This is the Employment Incentives Act of 1989.

Madam President, over the past several years a new term has been coined to describe a segment of our Nation's work force. Sadly it applies to millions of Americans and their families who work hard, yet remain in poverty. The term is the "working-poor."

Our country was built on the belief that if you worked hard, you would get ahead. But too many hard-working families are falling behind. Despite full-time jobs, despite a commitment to self-reliance, they remain in poverty.

I believe we ought to have a principle established in America that someone who is willing and able to work should not be below the poverty line.

We ought to have a principle that someone who is willing to work should be better off than someone who is on welfare. We should not encourage families to stay on welfare because they get more financial benefits in the form of money and health benefits, et cetera, than they do if they go into the work force.

We attempted to address this problem in the last Congress with the welfare reform measure, which was a major step forward. I supported it. The occupant of the chair [Ms. MIKULSKI] supported it. We had tremendous leadership from our colleague from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, who was the main sponsor of this legislation, and from Representative DOWNEY in the other body the main sponsor of that measure. We still have work to do.

Millions who are in the work force remain well below the poverty line. There are an estimated 9 million working poor in this country. Most have families. Nearly 20 million poor adults and children are living in families in which someone is in the work force and is working during the year. And, Madam President, the ranks of the working poor are growing rapidly, because of growing wage inequality and an increase in the number of low-wage jobs.

We know that the minimum wage has not been increased in 7 years. It is also true that 80 percent of the new jobs created in that time have been in service and retail trade, the lowest paying industries in the private sector.

Working poor families are the most vulnerable of the poor, and they need help because the so-called safety net of Government benefits is rarely available to them.

As a result, working poor families are often as far below the poverty line as welfare families in which no one is working.

Madam President, poverty, in spite of work, is a travesty. If someone is working and is still way below the poverty line, that is an unacceptable situation.

Our society simply must find a way to increase the benefits of working, if we hope to diminish poverty among families and encourage work for the nonworking welfare dependent. The increasing presence of working poor Americans does not offer an appealing alternative toward which those on welfare can look. But there are steps that we can take. Increasing the minimum wage is one approach that Congress will be looking at shortly to help the low-income working families.

I support that move, but we can do something else to assist working poor families. We can provide greater tax incentives for those who are willing to work and send a message that our society believes that work should be rewarded and that people who work should not be poor.

So today, Madam President, I am introducing the Employment Incentives Act of 1989 to assist those who work hard, yet still find themselves and their families below the poverty line or close to it.

The bill mainly will provide tax relief for the working poor. It will not create any new programs. It will simply change existing Federal laws to target aid to families with low incomes.

What does the bill do? Very briefly, the bill will do three things: First of all, it will increase the earned income tax credit and adjust it for family size.

Second, it will make the dependent care tax credit refundable to those with very low incomes and increase the average amount of the credit available to low-income families.

Third, it will increase funding for the title XX social services block grant, to provide additional resources for child care and training of child care providers.

This measure is not intended in any way as a substitute for or competing alternative to the measure introduced by the Senator from Connecticut, Senator DODD, on the subject of child care. I applaud and support his initiative.

This is a complementary measure and one which I think has an excellent chance of solving a major part of the problem. Now, let me take these provisions one by one.

First of all, modifying the earned income tax credit is probably the simplest initiative we can undertake to make work pay better. Since a modest earned income tax credit is already in place in the current tax system, expanding it will be administratively easy. The basic idea is simple. Families with low earnings gain tax credits for each dollar that they earn.

The earned income tax credit was designed to provide tax relief for low-income working families with children. It also provides an incentive to work; only those who do work get the credit. And up to the maximum income level, the more a person works, the greater the earned income tax credit benefit. The EITC portion of the Employment Incentives Act would expand the EITC, and vary the size of the credit, not only by income level, but also by family size. The goal of this provision is to help families of all sizes with a full-time worker escape poverty.

As currently structured, the earned income tax credit provides much less assistance to large families relative to the poverty line than it provides small families. Expanding the EITC and varying it by family size would follow the commonsense notion that a family's needs are a function of size as well as income.

The second part of the Employment Incentives Act will modify the existing dependent care tax credit, which is the largest Federal program providing child care benefits for working parents. The dependent care tax credit is presently a nonrefundable credit against income tax liability available for up to 30 percent of a limited amount of child care expenses.

The child and dependent care credit presently has a major deficiency, however. It will not provide any relief to a family with income so low that it has no tax liability.

Madam President, these families are the ones who frequently need assistance with child care the most, so that they can have an easier time getting into the work force. If they have no money and if they have no child care this program on the books today which is supposed to help with child care does not give them any assistance in getting back on the work rolls.

Work "pays" less for these low-income families than it would were they able, as are wealthier families, to offset employment-related child care expenses. A work subsidy that discriminates against the poor certainly seems counterproductive, to say nothing of ethically troubling. Therefore, we will make this credit refundable.

Finally, the Employment Incentives Act includes a modest increase in the title XX social services block grant to help low-income families offset their primary work-related expense: Much has been made of the large gap between the number of children in need of child care and the availability of such care services for low-income families. Very young children are particularly lacking and the trend is getting worse because of limited funds. Twenty-three States provided title XX funded child care to fewer children in 1986 than in 1981. Those are the last figures we have available. Now although a refundable day care credit will provide some relief to working poor families, some families will need greater assistance. In addition, not all of those eligible will take advantage of the credit. Some families will be unaware of eligibility, and others will find the tax system overwhelming and unfathomable. Even so, those who use the credit will find it reimburses only 30 percent of the families' child care expenses. Thus in increasing the title XX entitlement, we will assure that States have sufficient resources to fill the gaps. This would not occur if only a tax credit approach were used to assist the working poor.

The increased title XX funds also allow States to extend child care training activity, assuring parents of better quality child care from which to choose. After all the knowledge that children are being cared for by competent and well-trained providers, whoever they may be, is the best assurance for parents that children are safely cared for while they are at work.

Finally, Madam President, we completely pay for this entire bill in the bill itself. Let me briefly explain how. To finance the provisions of the Employment Incentives Act, we are proposing to adjust the design of the tax system to correct a flaw known as the bubble that resulted during tax reform a few years ago. As our colleagues know, unfortunately, the way the final law came into being, the marginal tax rate for those earning roughly between $150,000 and $200,000 a year is 33 percent. And then when you get to incomes above $200,000, that marginal rate comes incredibly back down from 33 percent to 28 percent.

Madam President, by assuring that those with the highest incomes in our society pay the same marginal tax rate as those in the bracket just below them, we completely finance this measure for working families with children.

And we do so within the terms of this legislation. Also, we have a little bit left over to reduce the deficit by $5 billion between now and the next few years.

The Employment Incentives Act is in short a plan of simple steps to help address a different problem.

It will enable some hardworking families struggling to make it to escape poverty. That is the goal of this bill. Families that work should not be poor.

This legislation is the result of months and months and months of carefully detailed work. The numbers have been crunched and crunched and crunched again. All the nuts and bolts have been carefully put into place. It is not just a broad-brushed rhetorical or ideological thrust or presentation. It could be enacted tomorrow with fiscal responsibility and have a tremendously beneficial impact on the working poor in America, so I urge my colleagues to support it. I look forward to working with them to try to enact this measure and I hope that it will receive an enormous amount of support. I will put the text of the bill in the RECORD in two places, and a much more detailed analysis and explanation complete with graphs—I mean charts and columns that demonstrate the detailed impact on families at every income level, depending upon how many children they have.

Madam President, I appreciate the courtesy and time. I yield the floor.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EMPLOYMENT INCENTIVES ACT: FAMILIES THAT WORK SHOULD NOT BE POOR

Americans who work hard and yet remain in poverty are among the most vulnerable of the poor. Government benefits that provide a "safety net" are rarely available to them. As a result, working-poor families are often as far below the poverty line as are welfare families in which no one is working. And yet, these families are working to feed and clothe their families.

The ranks of the working poor are growing substantially, primarily as a result of growing wage inequality and an increase in low-wage jobs. The increasing presence of working poor Americans does not offer an appealing alternative toward which those on welfare can look. This should trouble us all. Society must find a way to make work pay better if we hope to encourage work while diminishing poverty among families.

There is something that the Federal government can do to assist the working poor. It is not welfare; it is not an alternative to work. Rather, we should reward work and responsibility—provide a better level of pay for those who are willing to work and help send a message that our society believes that work should be rewarded—that people who work should not be poor.

Our proposal includes two simple changes to our current Federal laws to help the working poor: expanding the earned income tax credit (EITC) and increasing and making refundable the dependent care tax credit. Virtually none of the money stemming from this proposal would go to people who do not work—it would be targeted to the working poor. An expanded EITC would subsidize the wages of the workng poor, increasing the return to work and therefore work effort—the exact opposite of welfare. Making the dependent care tax credit refundable, and increasing its benefits, would reduce the cost of going to work, likewise rewarding work. And both of these changes to current law would help people without any need of a stigmatizing, invasive, and often degrading welfare system.

This proposal would especially help two-parent families, since the working poor are usually found in two-parent families. But the proposal's other great achievement would be to help make work a more appealing alternative for single-parent families on welfare—who often do worse by going to work than remaining on welfare.

THE WORKING POOR IN AMERICA

Close to 20 million poor adults and children live in households in which someone works during the year. These working poor individuals represent a significant proportion of the total poverty population—close to 60 percent. Even more newsworthy is the fact that over 5.5 million individuals live in poor households in which someone works full-time year-round.

The experience of living in poverty despite work is not restricted to categories of individuals most typically associated with poverty—single-parent families, women, and minorities. Of all families that are poor despite having a full-time year-round working head-of-household, 71 percent are families in which two parents are present. More than 61 percent of all workers who fall into poverty despite full-time year-round work are men. In addition, 79 percent of full-time year-round workers who live in poverty are white.

The fact that so many individuals have joined the ranks of the working poor is astounding; even more alarming, however, are data which show that the working population is increasingly composed of poor individuals. Data from the Census Bureau reveal that the number of working age individuals (persons ages 22 to 64) who work but are still poor was 44 percent larger in 1987 than 1978. Moreover, the number of people who work full-time year-round and are still poor increased more than 42 percent between 1978 and 1987.

These numbers are a concern to all who believe that hard work should enable a family to support itself. They reveal that the returns to work are decreasing for those at the bottom. This fact may surprise those who have heard that family income has risen significantly over the past decade—17 percent in real terms between 1973 and 1987. However, there has been extremely unequal growth in family income across family types and also at different points in the income distribution, as figure 1 shows. Between 1973 and 1987, families with children experienced average real income growth of 13 percent—slower growth than among the overall population. Further, and even more significant, the poorest twenty percent of families with children suffered an income loss of 22 percent between 1973 and 1987. This loss is significant—over $2,300 per year for families that are clearly disadvantaged. Even the next poorest twenty percent of families with children—who without a doubt have significant income from their own earnings—lost 2.6 percent of family income between 1973 and 1987, equal to an average income loss of close to $600.

THE ROLE OF THE ECONOMY, FAMILY STRUCTURE, AND FEDERAL POLICY

These data raise a question: why are there so many more persons than in the past who live in working families that remain poor? What has happened to reduce the incomes of working Americans at the bottom of the income scale, and to thrust more of them into poverty? More than any other factor, the state of our nation's economy is crucial. All other factors being equal, as long as real wages are growing across-the-board and unemployment declines, the ranks of the working poor will shrink because real incomes will be up. However, recent economic growth has not resulted in real wage growth: on average, workers in low-wage jobs have actually suffered real wage losses. Furthermore, an increasing proportion of all jobs are low-wage. Changing family structure and Federal policies have also contributed to the increasing numbers of working poor.

Despite the fact that our nation has enjoyed close to six years of economic growth, much of this growth has gone to employ the vastly expanding labor force, not to higher wages. Overall wage levels have remained relatively stagnant. Median weekly wages for full-time workers were lower in real terms in 1987 than in any year in the 1970s. Furthermore, the growth in wages that has occurred has not been distributed equitably. There is growing evidence that wages for low-paying jobs have not moved in tandem with average wages in the economy as a whole, but rather have fallen off significantly compared to average wages.

Data from the Senate Budget Committee show that an increasing proportion of all jobs are low-wage. For example, the percent of all full-time year-round workers paid low-wages (less than $11,600 per year) increased between 1979 and 1987 from 18 percent to 21 percent, while the percent of full-time year-round workers in middle wage jobs (jobs paying $11,600 to $46,444 per year) fell 4 percentage points, from 78 to 74 percent. This problem of increasing low-wage job growth has been particularly acute for young families. The percent of all workers under 35 years of age found in low-wage jobs increased between 1979 and 1987 from 39 to 44 percent.

Besides wages, another factor contributing to the ranks of the working poor is demographics. An increasing proportion of all families is headed by a single-parent. Single-parent families are more likely to be poor than two-parent families, despite work. In one-parent families, the earner is usually a woman and is more likely than a man to have part-time or low-wage job. Furthermore, many families, facing stagnant wage rates, have been able to increase the number of hours they work in order to maintain or enhance their level of earnings. In many cases, this means that a second wage earner has joined the labor force. Single-parent families cannot usually adapt to the wage problem by increasing work through a second earner. At the same time, however, it bears noting that poverty rates were higher among both two-parent and single-parent families in 1986 than in 1978. In fact, poverty increased at a faster pace among two-parent families with a worker. This suggests that the demographic shift to more single-parent families accounts for only some of the overall rise in the ranks of the working poor.

Although there have been traditionally few government benefits or services targeted specifically toward the working poor, Federal policies have also played a role in reducing the incomes of working families on the margin of poverty. For example, there has been a declining federal commitment to maintain wages through minimum wage policies. The minimum wage has not been adjusted in seven years, while inflation has raised consumer prices 33 percent over this period. A majority of workers who are paid on an hourly basis and who live in households that are poor have earnings at or near the minimum wage.

In addition to changing wage policies, benefit cuts have affected low-income families. The bulk of budget cuts in means-tested programs hit families in the $5,000 to $12,000 range, precisely the same categories in which the working poor are found. Most analysts across the political spectrum concur that the group hit hardest by the budget cuts in the AFDC program, employment and training programs, and unemployment insurance programs was the working poor population. Consider recent cuts in the AFDC program. The largest of them were explicitly aimed at mothers who worked but still had low incomes. A GAO report found that eighty percent of the families terminated from AFDC were below the poverty line 1½ to 2 years after being cut from the program. A number of these families had been above the poverty line before the cuts, but the loss of AFDC income pushed them into poverty.

Figure 2 illustrates what now happens to an AFDC family (this one consisting of a mother with two children) if the mother goes to work full-time at a low-wage job (for example, at the minimum wage of roughly $7,000 per year). Basically, she loses all cash support. Reductions in food stamp and AFDC benefits, and increases in taxes and work expenses, all combine to leave her family no better off economically than it would be were she not to work at all. This marginal tax rate on her earnings has increased 40 percent in less than a decade, and surely has discouraged work and lowered earnings for welfare recipients.

POLICIES THAT MAKE WORK PAY

Fortunately, despite this gloomy picture, the growing emphasis on the need for "self sufficiency" provides fertile ground to highlight the conditions of the working poor. The proposition that the working poor should be rewarded not punished, and should enjoy better living conditions than those who do not work, should elicit little opposition.

What can we do? We need a set of initiatives that assists the working poor. In so doing, the last thing we want to do is create a system that discourages and penalizes work or that isolates and stigmatizes the very people who are struggling to become part of the economic mainstream. Instead, we want to find ways to reinforce their efforts, to integrate them, and to indicate that their work is valued and that work will pay off. If we want to have a society of which it truly can be said that anyone who works can make it, if we want to help working-poor families, then, surely, we must find better rewards for the efforts of the working poor.

When someone works to support his or her family and the family is still poor, the most obvious problem is the person's low wages. So the equally obvious answer is to raise wages. If we could magically raise wages among low-paid workers without diminishing the number of jobs, we would increase the reward to work and the autonomy of low-income working families; we also would probably strengthen families and help integrate people into the economic mainstream. Those who are now the working poor would feel economically secure without the need for welfare. Those who are now on welfare would find that, instead of losing income as they go to work at low wages, work actually pays off.

As noted above, one way to raise wages is to have strong, widely-shared economic growth. Working poor families ride the roller coaster of broad economic trends and they pray for better paying jobs. Eventually, economic growth whose benefits are widely distributed could pull most of these families out of poverty. But recent economic growth has gone to employing the vastly expanding labor force, not to higher wages. And while we wait for economic growth to trickle down, working poor families remain among the country's least secure people.

One of the most important initiatives we can undertake to make work pay better is the earned income tax credit (EITC). A modest EITC is already in place in the current tax system, so expanding it would be easy. The basic idea is simple: families with low earnings gain tax credits for each dollar that they earn. The EITC was designed to provide tax relief for low-income working families with children. It also provides an incentive to work: only those who work get the credit, and, up to the maximum income level, the more a person works the greater the EITC benefit. In addition to the work incentive benefits, the EITC is easy to administer.

The EITC portion of the proposal would expand the EITC and vary the size of the credit not only by income level but also by family size. The goal of this provision is to help families of all sizes with a full-time worker escape poverty. As currently structured, the EITC provides much less assistance to large families relative to the poverty line than it provides small families. Expanding the EITC and varying it by family size would follow the common-sense notion that the extent of a family's needs is a function of its size as well as income. Because such a move would be both pro-work and pro-family, it has been hailed by conservatives and liberals alike.

The second component of the proposal is to modify the existing dependent care tax credit, the largest Federal program providing child care benefits for working parents. The dependent care tax credit is a nonrefundable credit against income tax liability, available for up to 30 percent of a limited amount of child care expenses. The child and dependent care credit has a major deficiency, however: it won't provide any relief to a family with income so low that it has no tax liability. Work "pays" less for these low-income families than it would were they able, as are wealthier families, to offset employment-related child care expenses. A work subsidy that discriminates against the poor certainly seems counterproductive, to say nothing of ethically troubling.

Finally, the proposal includes a modest increase in the Title XX social services block grant to help low-income families offset their primary work-related expense: child care. Much has been made of the large gap between the number of children in need of child care and the availability of such care. Services for low-income families, and very young children, are particularly lacking and the trend is getting worse. Because of limited funds, 23 States provided Title XX-funded child care to fewer children in 1986 than in 1981.

Although a refundable day care credit will provide some relief to working poor families, some families will need greater assistance. In addition, not all those eligible will take advantage of the credit; some families will be unaware of their eligibility. Others will find the tax system overwhelming and unfathomable. Even those who use the credit will find that it reimburses only a portion of the family's child care expenses. Increasing the Title XX entitlement will assure that States have sufficient resources to fill the gaps that would occur if only a tax credit approach were used to assist the working poor.

The increased Title XX funds will also allow States to expand their child care training activities, assuring parents of better quality child care from which to choose. After all, the knowledge that children are being cared for by competent and well-trained providers—whoever they may be—is the best assurance for parents that their children are safely cared for while they are at work.

In summary, the proposal would maintain the existing dependent care tax credit, but make it refundable and increase the average amount of the credit available to low-income families. The earned income tax credit would be expanded and adjusted for family size. And, funding for the social services block grant would be increased. By so doing 1.6 million people who are working hard to make it will be able to escape poverty. And that's the overarching goal—families that work should not be poor.

SUMMARY OF THE PROPOSAL

I. Subsidize the Wages of the Working Poor.

A. Increase the earned income tax credit and adjust it for family size.

Present Law.—The earned income tax credit is a refundable tax credit available to married individuals filing joint returns who are entitled to a dependency exemption, surviving spouses, and unmarried heads of households who maintain a household for a child. If more than half of the family income used to provide support of the dependent or to defray household expenses, is from AFDC or certain other sources (including other means-tested transfer payments), the earned income credit generally is not available.

In 1990 the credit is estimated to equal 14 percent of the first $6,810 with a maximum credit of $953. For each dollar of adjusted gross income above $10,740, the credit is reduced by 10 cents. The $6,810 and $10,740 figures are adjusted annually for inflation. The size of the credit is unrelated to the number of dependents.

The EITC is refundable, so that an individual receives the benefit of the credit even if he or she has no tax liability for the year. Employers must add advance payments of the credit to an individual's paycheck upon request.

The Proposal.—The earned income tax credit would be increased and adjusted for family size. In 1990, for families with one child, the credit would equal 21 percent of the first $6,810 with a maximum credit of $1,430. For each dollar of adjusted gross income above $10,740, the credit would be reduced by 15 cents. For families with two or more children, the credit would equal 30 percent of the first $6,810 with a maximum credit of $2,043. The credit would be reduced by 20 cents for each dollar of adjusted gross income above $10,740.

The credit would be completely phased out above an income of $20,270 for one-child families and $20,960 for larger families. The parameters for the earned income tax credit would continue to be adjusted annually for inflation.

The number of children used for determining eligibility for the more-than-one-child rate would be based on the number of exemptions taken for children who reside with the taxpayer. Benefits provided under means-tested transfer payment programs would not be taken into account in measuring support or household expenses to assure that all families with low annual earnings receive the credit.

In addition, to increase the number of families who receive the credit in advance, employers would be required to obtain from all new employees a form on which advance payments are requested or refused under present law. The EITC advance payment election would continue in effect until the taxpayer revokes the election. The advance payment amount would also be adjusted for family size.

II. Reduce the Cost of Working.

A. Make the dependent care credit refundable.

Present Law.—A nonrefundable credit against income tax liability is available for up to 30 percent of a limited amount of employment-related dependent care expenses. Such expenses are limited to $2,400 (with a maximum credit of $720) if there is one qualifying individual, and $4,800 (with a maximum credit of $1,440) if there are two or more qualifying individuals. A qualifiying individual is a dependent under the age of 13, or a physically or mentally incapacitated dependent or spouse. In the case of married taxpayers, the credit is also limited to no more than the earned income of the spouse with the lesser earnings. The credit is nonrefundable (i.e., limited to tax liability).

The 30-percent credit rate is reduced, but not below 20 percent, by one percentage point for each $2,000 (or fraction thereof) of adjusted gross income above $10,000.

Present law also provides that expenses for AFDC reimbursed child care may not be treated as income in determining eligibility for any Federal need-based program and may not be claimed as an employment-related expense for purposes of the dependent care credit.

The Proposal.—The dependent care credit would be made refundable so that it would be available to an individual without regard to the amount of the person's tax liability. Expenses for disabled spouses and dependents would continue to be eligible for the credit as under present law.

In addition, the 30 percent credit rate would be reduced to a 20 percent rate between $20,000 and $29,000 of adjusted gross income rather than between $10,000 and $28,000 as under present law.

Under the proposal, the "no double dipping" rule established for the AFDC program would be extended to Title XX day care.

Finally, the Treasury Department would be directed to conduct a study (including demonstration projects) of the feasibility of an advance payment system for the dependent care credit.

Figure 4 illustrates the effect of the dependent care credit proposal. In combination the EITC and dependent care credit proposals would provide substantial benefits to working poor families as the following table illustrates.

This calculation further assumes, for illustrative purposes only, that child care expenses do not equal more than 50 percent of a family's income.

Figures 5 illustrates the effect of the EITC and dependent care credit proposals.

B. Increase funding for the Title XX social services block grant

Present Law—Under Title XX of the Social Security Act States are entitled to receive social services block grant funds. These funds must be used to provide services directed at achieving five national goals: preventing or reducing dependency; achieving self-sufficiency; preventing or remedying neglect, abuse or exploitation of children and adults; preventing or reducing inappropriate institutional care; and providing services or referrals to individuals in institutions.

Title XX is a capped entitlement; funds are currently limited to $2.7 billion annually. Nearly all States use Title XX funds to provide child care assistance to needy families.

Proposal—To Provide additional resources for child care and training of child care providers, the Title XX ceiling would be increased as follows: $2.9 billion in fiscal year 1991; $3.1 billion in fiscal year 1992; and $3.3 billion in fiscal year 1993 and thereafter.

HOW TO PAY FOR THE PROPOSAL: ELIMINATION OF THE "BUBBLE" IN THE INDIVIDUAL TAX RATE SCHEDULES

Present Law—Under present law, the individual tax rate schedules for each filing status consist of two explicit marginal tax rate brackets—15 and 28 percent. Some taxpayers in the 28 percent bracket, however, face a marginal tax rate of 33 percent—a result of the 28 percent rate plus an additional 5 percent tax associated with the phaseout of the 15 percent bracket and personal exemptions over a range of taxable income.

In 1990, the projected phaseout range is $47,000 to $109,050 of taxable income for single taxpayers, and $78,350 to $208,510 for a couple with two children filing jointly. Taxpayers with taxable income within these ranges face a 33 percent marginal tax rate. Taxpayers with incomes above the phaseout ranges face a 28 percent marginal tax rate. Thus, certain very high income taxpayers are taxed at a lower marginal rate than other taxpayers with somewhat lower income.

Under current law, capital gains income and ordinary income are taxed at the same rate.

The Proposal—Under the proposal, an explicit 33 percent marginal tax bracket would be added to the individual rate schedules. This tax rate would apply to all taxable income (with the exception of certain capital gains) in excess of the amount at which the 5 percent phaseout tax begins to apply under current law. Taxes would be raised only for those high-income families for whom the 15 percent bracket and personal exemptions are completely phased out under current law. For example, a married couple with two children would pay higher taxes only if their taxable income for 1990 was $208,510 or higher.

In order to avoid increasing the present tax rate on long-term capital gains, the proposal also provides for a 28 percent tax rate on certain long-term capital gains. This rate would apply to the amount of taxable income that is in excess of the present law phaseout range and that is attributable to long-term capital gains.

Eliminating the "bubble" raises sufficient revenue to fully offest the cost of the bill as the following table illustrates:

S. 365. A bill to provide for the continuation of certain basic services of the Postal Service consistent with postal policies under section 101 of title 39, United States Code, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

FREE POSTAL DELIVERY PROTECTION ACT

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, last year the postal community was singled out by the President's Commission on Privatization as one of several Federal services that should be privatized. While such a recommendation was not surprising coming from that Commission, I was concerned that certain precursers of privatization could be implemented administratively—without actual legislation.

As a result, in the 100th Congress, I introduced S. 2242, the Free Postal Delivery Act of 1988. This bill would reaffirm our national commitment to universal postal service.

Because of my concern that the notion of privatizing the U.S. Postal Service may remain alive in certain circles, I am today reintroducing the Free Postal Delivery Act to reinforce my strong conviction that a strong majority in Congress supports the principle that citizens of our country should be guaranteed the right to comprehensive and efficient Postal Service.

Every year, small communities throughout the country, and especially in predominently rural States like South Dakota, are threatened with reductions in their Postal Service. Rumors of wholesale closings of small community post offices seem to be an annual rite of passage.

This past year has been an exception, as I continue to receive a disproportionate number of requests from postal customers and employees for help in saving rural postal facilities. The citizens of our country deserve to be free of the spectre of service reductions caused by unjustifiable post office closings.

Last year's attack by the President's Commission on Privatization recommended the repeal of the private express statutes for rural delivery immediately. Absent heavy subsidies, the repeal of these statutes, which would effectively privatize the U.S. Postal Service, would have a devastating impact on the residents of rural America.

I remain confident that the U.S. Congress will not tamper with the private express statutes. My legislation, the Free Postal Delivery Protection Act of 1989, would underscore our national commitment to a universal Postal Service and prempt any serious discussion of administrative attempts to reduce postal service to rural or urban areas.

My bill simply reaffirms three basic principles—free mail delivery, maximum delivery schedules, and standardized service nationwide.

FREE DELIVERY

The cost of mail delivery is not today, nor should it be tomorrow, based on a person's location or proximity to large population centers. We have committed ourselves to a unified Postal Service charged with uniting all parts of the Nation. A guarantee of free mail delivery at uniform delivery rates is the strongest public signal Congress can send to the U.S. Postal Service and the public about its commitment to unified postal delivery. The Free Postal Delivery Protection Act of 1989 would once again write into law the commonly held perception that postal patrons shall be guaranteed free delivery of mail.

MAXIMUM DELIVERY SCHEDULES

The need for regular delivery of mail is the same for both urban and rural postal patrons. Many people in this nation rely on the U.S. Postal Service for the delivery of timely letters, publications and urgently needed medications. While urban patrons can typically rely on regular 6-day delivery schedules, many of their rural counterparts receive delivery as infrequently as three times per week.

The people who rely on the Postal System for delivery of essential medicines, such as insulin and other prescription drugs deserve a message of reassurance that they will not suffer further erosion of service. The Free Postal Delivery Protection Act would send such a message by writing into law a mandate for providing timely postal delivery service to all patrons.

STANDARDIZED SERVICE

Currently, Congress requires that the Postal Service follow certain steps before closing or consolidating a post office or delivery route. One glaring deficiency in the evaluation process, however, is the lack of an objective standard to measure service. The Free Postal Delivery Protection Act will mandate that the service to be provided under a proposed closing or consolidation be measured against the service for similar areas throughout the postal division. This provision would ensure that all similarly situated postal patrons would receive similar service.

Under this bill, the Postal Service would also be required to provide members of a community threatened by a closure with alternatives for Postal Services, ranging from a contract station to regular, in-person delivery service. These alternatives, in turn, must maintain service levels in the area.

Mr. President, the U.S. Postal Service handled 160.5 billion pieces of mail in 1988. It is clear that this agency is one of the most heavily relied upon vehicles for the delivery and receipt of information. To many rural South Dakotans, the U.S. Postal Service is the only viable delivery source for basic necessities. I suspect that, with nearly 43,000 rural mail routes nationwide, many of my colleagues have constituencies which share our concern about the threat to rural free delivery posed by the advocates of privatization efforts.

The Free Postal Delivery Protection Act of 1989 is designed to help restore public confidence in the U.S. Postal Service and protect the basic services guaranteed to postal patrons. I ask my colleagues to join me in reaffirming our national commitment to the principle that Postal Services in this Nation are basic and fundamental.

I thank the Chair and ask that the entire text of my bill be reprinted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 365

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Free Postal Delivery Protection Act of 1989".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. Consistent with Postal policy under this section 101 of title 39, United States Code, the Congress finds that—

(1) there is a need for reaffirmation of the basic policies under such section, including the operation of the Postal Service as a basic fundamental service;

(2) postal needs of urban and rural residents are similar and there is a need to maintain quality office service;

(3) wholesale privatization of basic services, specifically free delivery, poses a direct threat to the bond between the Government and citizens;

(4) postal patrons need six-day mail delivery, and such patrons rely on six-day delivery for timely publications such as newspapers, and for urgent needs such as medication; and

(5) closures and consolidations of offices need to be evaluated on objective criteria and measured against service within the same Postal Service division.

FREE DELIVERY AND SIX-DAY DELIVERY SERVICE

SEC. 3. Section 403(b) of title 39, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2) by striking out "and" at the end thereof;

(2) in paragraph (3) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(4) consistent with Postal policies under section 101 of this title, to provide for, and maintain a delivery service for the free delivery of mail serving the entire urban and rural population of the United States to the greatest extent practicable; and

"(5) consistent with Postal policies under section 101 of this title, to maintain a six-day mail delivery schedule in all areas to the greatest extent practicable, and to maintain the minimum delivery level of such delivery schedules at the fiscal year 1983 level.".

CLOSING AND CONSOLIDATION OF POST OFFICES

SEC. 4. Section 404(b) of title 39, United States Code, is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2)

(A) in subparagraph (D) by striking out "and" at the end thereof; and

(B) by redesignating subparagraph (E) as subparagraph (F) and inserting after subparagraph (D) the following new subparagraph:

"(E) whether such closing or consolidation may substantially change the character and nature of delivery relative to delivery service for other post offices in the same Postal Service division; and"; and

(2) in paragraph (3) by inserting ", along with proposed alternatives for service," in the second sentence after "finding".●

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and Mr. DASCHLE):

S. 366. A bill to amend title XVIII of the Social Security Act to make certain payment reforms in the Medicare Program to ensure the adequate provision of health care in rural areas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

RURAL HEALTH MANPOWER ASSISTANCE ACT

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today we are introducing a bill for rural America, the Rural Health Manpower Assistance Act of 1989.

Joining me in this effort are two of my distinguished colleagues on the Finance committee, Senator ROCKEFELLER and Senator DASCHLE. Both have been good friends to rural America. I am pleased to have their support.

Last year we introduced the Rural Health Payment Reform Act of 1988. Several components of that bill, dealing with health manpower needs are extended in our current legislation.

During the 100th Congress we introduced the Rural Health Care Viability Act of 1987. That bill made a number of small, but badly needed, changes in health care laws affecting rural physicians. We have been encouraged by the positive response that initiative received. Congress enacted the majority of the bill as part of the 1987 Reconciliation Act.

This bill amplifies the important changes that have been made in the last Congress, and adds some new ones that are equally necessary.

Mr. President, let me explain why we need this bill.

Providing access to health care providers in the far corners of our country is no easy task.

In my own State of Montana, more than two-thirds of the State's population lives outside of our cities. Nearly 60 percent of the counties are classified as "health manpower shortage areas," one of the highest rates in the Nation. Despite the staggering numbers of new physicians being graduated from schools, too few are electing to practice as primary care providers in isolated rural areas. Right at this moment over 50 percent of Montana's counties are searching for physicians to provide basic health care.

But this is not just a problem in Montana. Consider these facts about rural America: First, almost one-fourth of the U.S. population lives in rural areas, but a full 30 percent of seniors eligible for Medicare live in these regions, second, chronic diseases such as arthritis are more prevalent than in urban areas, as are work related injuries and disability, third, infant mortality rates are higher than in cities, and fourth, despite these health care needs, physician to population ratios in small rural areas are one-third that in urban areas.

Why aren't physicians starting practices in rural America? More and more new doctors are going to better compensated specialties, rather than primary care. People care doesn't pay as well as procedure care. In the U.S. rural doctors are paid one-third less than their urban counterparts for exactly the same services. In Canada doctors get a 10-percent bonus for working in rural areas. Doctors in small rural areas feel isolated from new advances and specialty consultation. There is no one down the hall with whom to talk over a case. Indeed, in many respects we are ignorant of what really works in getting a doctor to practice in rural America, or what are the country's rural health manpower needs.

These are serious problems and they must be addressed. We await with anticipation the deliberations of the Physicians' Payment Review Commission that will address the relative value of primary care services, and geographic variability of payment. It appears, however, that the Commission's deliberations may take an extended period of time. Time that rural America cannot afford.

The bill we are introducing today is an effort to help anchor doctors in underserved rural areas while the discussions of more basic and far-reaching reform continue.

The 100th Congress approved modest increases in the amount Medicare pays for all services provided by physicians practicing in rural health manpower shortage areas. This was an important first step in our efforts to restore some equity between urban and rural health professionals as well as provide a signal for those who practice in these areas that we in Congress understand their problems.

The bill we are introducing today adds an additional bonus of 5 percent over that paid this year, but only for primary care services. A few percentage points might not make a big difference right away, but it does send the right message.

Health professionals in rural areas can feel extremely isolated. At times their patients may wonder whether they are receiving the most up to date health care. One solution is to create new ongoing partnerships between providers in rural and urban areas.

The second provision of this bill will establish state of the art telecommunication linkages between rural providers and their colleagues in urban areas. Systems have been developed that allow joint real-time evaluation of patients and diagnostic tests. This improves the quality of care as well as reducing the sense of isolation that many rural physicians experience.

In trying to assess Montana's future health manpower needs, I am frustrated by the lack of data on which to make sound judgments. Rural America has been lost in the shuffle when people think about access or funding.

In the coming year several studies by GAO and OTA will provide a new data base about health care in rural America. The final provision of my bill asks the Secretary to use these new sources of information to prepare a report on rural health manpower needs to be provided to Congress within the next year.

These are not easy times in rural America. Dedicated health care professionals are being buffeted by many storms, and are having an increasingly difficult time remaining afloat.

We in Congress frequently debate the theoretical consequences of health policy on patient access. More often than not the closing of a hospital or the loss of a doctor in a city means moving your health care down the block. Losing a doctor in rural America suddenly confronts thousands of good people with the harsh reality of having no one to care for them.

Improving the lot of isolated rural primary care providers is a small change. But this bill, and others that we plan to introduce, may just be the anchor that will allow them to ride out the storm in a safe harbor.

The Nation's rural citizens deserve no less.

We hope many more of our colleagues will join us in support of the Rural Health Manpower Assistance Act of 1989.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the Rural Health Manpower Assistance Act of 1989 be included in the RECORD following my statement.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

● Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, I am very pleased to join Senators BAUCUS and ROCKEFELLER today in introducing the Rural Health Manpower Assistance Act of 1989. This bill attempts to address the serious health manpower shortages that plague to many of our rural communities. In cosponsoring this bill, I want to commend my colleagues Senators BAUCUS and ROCKEFELLER for their dedication to improving the state of health care in rural America and ensuring that rural Americans receive the same quality care that their urban counterparts enjoy.

Across the country, rural Americans are forgoing essential health care services because physicians and other health personnel are just not available. This overextended rural health system, financially strained by inadequate Medicare policies, is a formula for a health care crisis in rural America.

We have all heard the sobering statistics: rural America holds 33 percent of the population, but only 12 percent of the physicians and 18 percent of the nurses. One may wonder why this disparity exists, since most people believe that physicians who practice in rural areas forsake more lucrative practice in urban areas for the slower pace, closer patient relationships, and personal gratification of rural practice. Unfortunately, as I learned during a recent health care tour in my home State of South Dakota, this stereotype has come under fire.

My travels across the State, talking to rural physicians and other health providers and patients, confirmed my belief that physicians in rural areas are struggling to provide high quality services under very adverse conditions. In fact, rural doctors must be available around-the-clock to serve older, poorer, and sicker patients using equipment that is often deteriorating and outdated. The pace of rural medicine is anything but relaxing. It is no wonder there are currently over 40 openings for family physicians in South Dakota.

For their extra effort, rural physicians find their reimbursement levels far lower than their urban counterparts; Medicare payment differentials between urban and rural areas can run as high as 60 percent. And because the elderly represent a disproportionate share of the overall rural population in most States, rural physicians tend to be more dependent on Medicare payments. This means the Medicare reimbursement system actually acts as a deterrent to rural practice.

The message that this sends to our Nation's medical school graduates is clear: If you want to work at first class facilities and receive a fair wage, a rural area is not the place to go. Given the severe shortage of rural personnel, we should be sending exactly the opposite message.

This bill takes a first step toward making Medicare payments more equitable by raising bonus payments from 5 to 10 percent for physicians who provide primary care services in rural areas. This kind of an incentive is badly needed in States like South Dakota, where the Federal Government has designated about two-thirds of our State a "primary care shortage area."

This bill also expands demonstration projects that use satellite technology to link rural physicians with providers in urban areas. This will enable physicians in rural areas to keep up with current developments in urban teaching centers so that a physician practicing in Spearfish, SD, for example, can benefit from the medical advances coming out of Minneapolis. This will help to reduce the professional isolation that physicians in remote rural areas face every day.

Finally, the bill requires the Department of Health and Human Services to conduct a study assessing the health manpower supply in rural areas. This will help rural health planners determine the number of health care workers necessary to meet the current and future health care needs of rural residents. This information is currently unavailable.

In sum, health care in rural areas is not what it should be, and there are signs that the situation is deteriorating. This bill recognizes the need for a more concerted Federal effort to assist communities in meeting the challenges of the changing health care environment.

I hope that my colleagues will join me today in support of this important bill. The whole Nation will benefit from a healthier rural America.●

By Mr. COCHRAN:

S. 368. A bill for the relief of Dr. Cornell H. Petrassevich; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RELIEF OF DR. CORNELL H. PETRASSEVICH

● Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, today I am introducing private relief legislation on behalf of Dr. Cornell Petrassevich, a U.S. citizen whose dedicated service to his homeland and adopted country have already been recognized by the U.S. Senate.

Dr. Petrassevich is a Romanian-born physician who served in the Romanian Army from 1941 to 1945. After separation from the Romanian Army, he became a medical officer with the Young Men's Christian Association [YMCA] in Bucharest.

Through his contacts at the YMCA, Dr. Petrassevich became acquainted with the American Office of Strategic Services [OSS]. From 1944 to 1948, he served as a voluntary agent for the OSS in Bucharest, providing valuable information gathering services.

In 1948, Dr. Petrassevich, along with his father and brother, were arrested and later sentenced by a military court on charges of spying for American officials. Dr. Petrassevich survived 15 years of torture and hard labor in Romanian prisons. His father and brother both died within a few years of their imprisonment.

After his release, Dr. Petrassevich petitioned for immigration to the United States, but was not allowed out of Romania until 1969. He subsequently became a U.S. citizen and has worked with several hospitals as a Public Health Service physician. He retired in 1982 and is now living in Philadelphia, MS.

My bill would enable Dr. Petrassevich to obtain compensation for his service and activities on behalf of the American Office of Strategic Services from 1944 to 1948 in Romania, and his subsequent imprisonment by the Romanian Government for 15 years.

Mr. President, Senator John Stennis first called my attention to this situation prior to his retirement from this body. Senator Stennis began work on legislation for the relief of Dr. Petrassevich late in the 100th Congress, but, due to time constraints, was unable to introduce the bill. He asked me to consider taking up the matter during the 101st Congress, and then asked the Senate to pass a resolution commending Dr. Petrassevich for his service to the United States. The Senate passed Senate Resolution 498 on October 14, 1988.

Mr. President, while there is precedent for this type of legislative relief, Dr. Petrassevich's case is uniquely deserving on its own merits.

I hope the Judiciary Committee will approve this measure promptly.●

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. MURKOWSKI, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. GORE, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. LEVIN, Mr. SIMON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 369. A bill to seek the eradication of the worst aspects of poverty in developing countries by the year 2000; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

GLOBAL POVERTY REDUCTION ACT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I am very pleased to introduce today along with Senator HARKIN and 15 other colleagues, the Global Poverty Reduction Act. This bill, which was first introduced in the 100th Congress, directs that our foreign development assistance contribute in a way that can be measured to eradicating the worst aspects of absolute poverty by the year 2000.

Mr. President, poverty levels in many parts of the world are appalling and unacceptable. Infants and young children die for lack of proper health care and nutrition. Those that survive face bleak prospects of ever improving their lots. Frankly, I believe the United States can do better in helping to alleviate these conditions. That is the intent of the Global Poverty Reduction Act.

It seeks to accomplish this by proposing goals to which our bilateral development assistance should be directed. Among these goals are:

First, to reduce the mortality rate of children under 5 years old [U5MR] to 70 per 1,000 live births. According to the latest UN statistics, the U5MR rate is above 70 in 72 countries. In the 33 poorest countries, it is above 170.

Second, to increase the female literacy rate to 80 percent. It is currently around 22 percent in the 33 poorest countries. Since women provide almost all child care in developing countries, their ability to read directly affects the quality care they can provide and correlates directly to the child mortality rate.

Third, to achieve an absolute poverty level of not more than 20 percent of the population. The absolute poverty level is defined as that income level below which minimum nutritional needs and essential nonfood requirements are not affordable. Again, in the 33 poorest countries, the percentage of those in rural areas living below this level is 65 percent, and in urban areas, 35 percent.

The bill also calls on the President to develop a plan for these and any other goals he may choose, working in concert with other nations, private groups, and international organizations. Setting targets against which we can measure the effectiveness in achieving these goals makes sense. It worked in sending a man to the moon; it worked in wiping out smallpox; and it is working in the campaign around the world for oral rehydration. And in this case, it will let the American people see firsthand that their tax dollars are making a measurable and specific contribution toward erasing some of the worst aspects of poverty.

Mr. President, I want to commend RESULTS, a grassroots organization whose aim is to generate the political will to end world hunger. RESULTS has worked long and hard on the preparation and consideration of this bill and deserves a tremendous amount of credit. Partly as a result of their efforts, I believe that there is widespread support in favor of this bill. It was reintroduced in the House on January 19. In the last session, 194 Representatives and 27 Senators cosponsored this legislation. More than 70 private groups and more than 60 newspapers nationwide editorially supported it. UNICEF has called the bill "an example of the public interest in seeing real aid used for real development."

I said last year that this is a bill whose time has come. I repeat those words today. As the legislative process proceeds, I look forward to working with my colleagues, with AID, and with other interested parties to refine and modify the bill as necessary. It is my hope that this legislation receives the full consideration of the Senate. Its aim is ambitious, its approach pragmatic, and its mission absolutely essential.●

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, in his 1949 inaugural address, President Harry Truman observed that: "More than half the people of the world are living in conditions approaching misery. Their food is inadequate. They are victims of disease. Their economic life is primitive and stagnant. Their poverty is a handicap and a threat to them and to more prosperous areas."

That was nearly 40 years ago, but the message is just as true today as it was then.

Despite the billions in foreign aid we spend every year, over the past 40 years since Truman's address, the problems humanitarian aid is supposed to address persist. Of the foreign aid allocated in 1988, not all was targeted to help people in developing countries overcome hunger, poverty, illness, and ignorance, as called for in the 1961 Foreign Assistance Act.

In fact, of that $14 billion, $5.3 billion is going to military aid and $3.2 billion in cash payments to strategically valuable countries. Less than $3 billion—$2.7 billion to be exact—is spent on bilateral development assistance. Some of these funds help achieve the four goals set forth in the 1961 Foreign Assistance Act. However, much is spent without specific goals in mind.

For this reason, along with Senator BOSCHWITZ, I am introducing the Global Poverty Reduction Act, which seeks to target U.S. development assistance to eliminate the worst aspects of world poverty. I am pleased to join Congressmen MEL LEVINE and JOHN MILLER, who have introduced a similar measure in the House of Representatives. A similar measure introduced in the previous Congress enjoyed the sponsorship of 27 Senators and 194 Members of Congress.

This legislation specifies three targets for measuring the U.S. development assistance program's success in reducing malnutrition, disease, starvation, and poverty.

The first is an under five mortality rate of 70 by the year 2000. The under five mortality rate [U5MR] is the annual number of deaths of children under 5 per 1,000 live births. The U5MR of 70 is roughly equivalent to the United Nations Third Development Decade goal of an infant mortality rate of 50 by the year 2000. UNICEF's "State of the World's Children 1988" report shows 33 countries with an U5MR greater than 170, compared to 74 countries in 1960 with a U5MR of 170.

The second is a female literacy rate of 80 percent by the year 2000. The female literacy rate is the percentage of females aged 15 and over who can read and write. Since women provide almost all of the child care in developing countries, an improvement in female literacy contributes directly to improving child survival by enabling women to read instructions for basic health, sanitation, medical, and nutritional standards. In addition, female literacy contributes to population control: As women become assured that their children will survive to adulthood, fewer births will be required to ensure that at least some will grow up.

The third would reduce to 20 percent a country's population living below absolute poverty. Absolute poverty is defined as the income level below which a minimum nutritionally adequate diet—plus essential nonfood requirements—are not affordable. U.S.

development aid would be targeted toward helping countries with over 40 percent of the population living in absolute poverty reduce that rate to less than 20 percent, and helping countries with absolute poverty rates of less than 40 percent halve their rates.

The Global Poverty Reduction Act directs the next President to consult with the Governments of developing countries, nongovernmental organizations, and international organizations to devise a plan to coordinate U.S. development aid to achieve these and other established antipoverty goals by the year 2000.

The practice of goal setting has already been established. Last year, President Reagan vowed to eradicate hunger in Africa by 2000. World Bank President Barber Conable calls for the elimination of the worst of Asian poverty by that date. And the World Health Assembly seeks a healthy world by 2000.

Noble goals, like reducing global poverty, are more likely to be realized if sights are set on specific targets. That is the principle underlying the three targets set by this legislation. None is easily achieved, yet none is out of reach.

Goal setting has already proven effective. Without it, the world would not have eradicated smallpox 11 years ago, and would not now be on its way to wiping out six other childhood diseases by 1990.

Establishing an accurate measurement of how effective aid is would not only help reduce poverty but could increase domestic support for foreign aid. Too often, Americans have seen their tax dollars end up in the pockets of dictators like Marcos and Duvalier. Others consider U.S. aid mismanaged, improperly disbursed, wasteful, and ineffective.

The result has been almost a yearly decrease in the foreign aid budget. On the other hand, domestic support would grow if American taxpayers saw measurable results from our foreign aid programs and if those programs benefited the world's poorest people, not the world's generals, bureaucrats, and despots.

Humanitarian concerns aside, this bill makes good economic sense for America. In 1980, Third World countries bought 88 billion dollars' worth of American goods. That figure dropped to $77 billion by 1985. Falling commodity prices and debt are important factors in this decline. But underdevelopment, which deprives people of the means overcoming their poverty, is the biggest problem. The concept is simple. A country's purchasing power increases not from the hunger of its people, of its growing population size, but from its growing wealth. Accordingly, our foreign assistance should be directed to programs to help developing nations build their indigenous economic base.

This legislation would aid developing countries make progress against disease and illiteracy which in turn will enable them to achieve economic growth and higher standards of living. This is not trickle down development theory, but trickle up. Expanding a country's growth potential will expand its purchasing power. In turn, U.S. producers will benefit. With these measurable results, support for U.S. foreign aid programs will grow as well.

I wish to inform my colleagues as well as interested parties in the development community that an ongoing dialog is now underway to examine the overall objectives and specifics of the Global Poverty Reduction Act. This discussion has been initiated in order to determine whether before this bill becomes law significant revisions will be required.

The Global Poverty Reduction Act's measurable goals makes sense and deserves the support of our colleagues in the Senate. I urge your support.●

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of legislation which directs the President to establish a plan to alleviate the worst aspects of absolute poverty by the year 2000.

When Congress passed the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, it pledged to "assist people in developing countries to eliminate hunger, poverty, illness, and ignorance." Now, 28 years later, less than 30 percent of foreign aid supports humanitarian goals and very little of this money is helping the neediest poor.

Global Poverty Reduction Act will use funds already allocated to target concern toward three main goals. By the year 2000, our bill calls for an under-5 mortality rate of 70 per 1,000 live births, a female literacy rate of 80 percent, and an absolute poverty level of not more than 20 percent of the population living below absolute poverty.

To follow the progress on these objectives, the President will consult with host country governments and international organizations which represent the poor in developing countries—i.e., CARE, UNICEF, RESULTS, and 21, other organizations which support the Global Poverty Reduction Act. The President will also prepare and present to Congress annual reports which explain his plans regarding this legislation.

Our bill will reinforce the purpose and goals of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961. Through this legislation, the United States will join forces with othr countries to combat the many social, environmental, and economic problems that are associated with poverty. I am pleased to support the Global Poverty Reductioin Act and I urge my colleagues in the Senate to join me in cosponsoring this legislation.●

S. 370. A bill to amend the Land and Water Conservation Fund Act and the National Historic Preservation Act, to establish the American Heritage Trust, for purposes of enhancing the protection of the Nation's natural, historical, cultural, and outdoor recreational heritage, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

AMERICAN HERITAGE TRUST ACT

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, last March, Congressman MO UDALL and I introduced H.R. 4127 and S. 2199, the American Heritage Trust Act. The legislation is designed to implement many of the recommendations that were made by the President's Commission on Americans Outdoors.

As recommended by the President's Commission, the key feature of the Udall-Chafee bill is the proposal to establish a permanent, dedicated Federal fund that will produce $1 billion each year to help State and local communities preserve open space, historic sites, and recreational opportunities all across the country. The idea is to begin a national campaign to renew and improve the Land and Water Conservation Fund and the Historic Preservation Fund.

There should be no mistake about what we are proposing here. By launching a major, new effort to preserve our natural and historic heritage, we are embarking on a course of action that will be one of the most significant and ambitious environmental movements in a long, long time.

Prior to adjournment last October, our bill was cosponsored by 41 Senators and 235 Members of the House of Representatives. In addition, it was approved by the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

I have a fact sheet on the legislation, including a list of groups that support our bill, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD following my statement.

Today, Mr. President, I am pleased to reintroduce the American Heritage Trust Act. Joining me as original cosponsors of the bill are Senators GRAHAM, FOWLER, ADAMS, BINGAMAN, COCHRAN, CRANSTON, DASCHLE, DURENBERGER, HUMPHREY, JEFFORDS, KASTEN, KENNEDY, LIEBERMAN, METZENBAUM, PELL, SARBANES, SASSER, ROCKEFELLER, and HEFLIN.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD following supporting statements and other related materials, including a summary of the legislation.

In short, this bill will convert the current Land and Water Conservation Fund [LWCF] and the Historic Preservation Fund [HPF] into a real trust fund. We do that by taking the current unappropriated balance of the funds, estimated to be $6.1 billion respectively, together with the existing flow of revenues—$900 million each year for the LWCF and $150 million each year for the HPF from, primarily, revenues generated by offshore oil and gas leases—and invest this money in government securities that generate interest each year.

Once funds have been added to the corpus of the trust, they stay there to earn interest. Once the corpus of the trust is large enough to yield $1 billion per year in interest for LWCF purposes and $250 million per year in interest for HPF purposes, the flow of revenues into the trust would stop.

In the meantime and in perpetuity, the interest from the trust would be automatically appropriated. After several years, the trust becomes self financing and no new government revenues are needed. In other words, by investing wisely now, we can endow a continuing legacy of our natural and cultural heritage.

I am excited about this new proposal and hope that it will start the ball rolling at the Federal level. As I said earlier, the idea is to begin a national campaign to renew and improve the Land and Water Conservation Fund and the Historic Preservation Fund.

It is worth noting that President Bush has already pledged to support the creation of a self-perpetuating trust fund based on the Land and Water Conservation Fund. To our new President I say "here it is." Take a look at this bill and let us get on with the task at hand. There are few things that would please me as much as working with the President and enacting this bill during this session of Congress.

Mr. President, this is a bold but responsible idea whose time has come. People care about preserving open space. They care deeply.

Time and time again we see State and local referenda on open space and historic preservation passing by huge margins. In the last few years, bond issues have passed in Rhode Island, Maine, New York, and Pennsylvania. The Massachusetts Legislature approved a $500 million bond issue for open space and recreation programs. Last year in California, voters approved a $776 million bond issue to preserve wetlands, wildlife habitat, and parkland.

Unfortunately, the Federal Government has been lagging behind. Over the past several years, we have been appropriating an average of less than $200 million under the Land and Water Conservation Fund and less than $30 million under the Historic Preservation Fund.

At the same time, all across the country, open space and public access to recreational opportunities are being threatened by urbanization and improper planning. Such destructive activities often adversely affect the quality of our rivers, lakes, and shorelines.

Just imagine how much we could do if State and local governments knew they could rely on a substantial level of matching Federal grants to buy land, to develop recreation facilities, or to preserve historic buildings. That is what this bill is about.

One of the more significant features of this bill is the fact that it recognizes the importance of historic preservation and the connection between historic preservation and controlling urban sprawl.

In recent years, we have seen a tremendous upsurge in historic preservation activities. The number of local historic preservation commissions increased from some 600 in the late 1970's to over 1,200 by 1986. Such renewed interest contributes significantly to the success of urban revitalization efforts which, in turn, help stem the tide of urban decay and the problem of businesses fleeing to the suburbs.

A 1985 study of four cities found that preservation was linked to a dramatic increase in physical renovation, the formation of new businesses, the stimulation of investment of private funds and lending, an increase in tourism, a decrease in crime, a significant rise in property values, and an overall improvement in the quality of life.

Opponents of this bill claim it is a budget buster. They say we cannot afford to revitalize the Land and Water Conservation Fund or the Historic Preservation Fund. That, Mr. President, is simply not true.

Listen to what the Congressional Budget Office concluded in the cost estimate prepared last year for H.R. 4127: After reviewing the relationship between outlays and interest income, the CBO stated that "such intragovernmental transfers have no net impact on the Federal budget." CBO went on to restate the conclusion that "creation of the Trust and the purchase of Federal debt securities would have no impact on the Federal budget."

Mr. President, the time has come to spark what Gov. Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, chairman of the President's Commission on Americans Outdoors, called a prairie fire of local creativity and activism to conserve the open spaces we care about and to develop the facilities we need. In an attempt to ignite that prairie fire, I am proud to offer this legislation and I urge all of my colleagues to join this important movement as cosponsors of this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, a summary, and supporting material be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 370

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "American Heritage Trust Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS, PURPOSE, AND POLICY.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that:

(1) The United States is a world leader in the protection of natural, historic, cultural, and outdoor recreational heritage and needs to continue to set an example of progressive stewardship of these resources.

(2) The natural, historic, cultural, and outdoor recreational resources of the United States represent the great and diverse character of the Nation, and these resources must be guarded, preserved, and wisely managed so they may be passed on to future generations.

(3) The continuing growth of population, especially in suburban and new urban areas, and advances in technology frequently combine to undermine the quantity and quality of natural, cultural, and historic resources. These areas are in need of open space acquisition to enhance the quality of life.

(4) The United States needs to demonstrate by its own policies and actions the pressing need to assure the global sustainability of species diversity and healthful functioning of natural systems which support all life on the planet.

(5) As we liquidate our nonrenewable resource capital assets, we should commit the proceeds to investment in other enduring capital assets to sustain the quality of life and economic opportunity for future generations.

(6) There is great need and opportunity for all levels of government and the private sector to rededicate themselves to the preservation of our resources heritage, in order to provide heightened long term economic viability and to enhance the quality of life for all our Nation's citizens of present and future generations.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act to strengthen existing mechanisms for, and provide a renewed dedication to, ensuring significantly enhanced protection and public enjoyment of our Nation's heritage, in perpetuity.

(c) POLICY.—It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to be a world exemplar of national heritage stewardship. To advance the achievement of such objective, the President shall submit to the Congress on October 1 1990, 1994, and 1998, a comprehensive program to be pursued in support of this policy.

TITLE I—AMERICAN HERITAGE TRUST

The remainder shall be allocated for any of such purposes or any combination thereof.".

SEC. 206. FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO STATES.

(b) MAXIMUM POTENTIAL APPORTIONMENT AND PROJECT LISTS.—Section 6(b) is amended by adding the following new paragraphs at the end thereof:

"(6) Annually on April 1, the Secretary shall notify each State of a potential apportionment (calculated as the average of the last 3 years of apportionments) it could receive for the fiscal year beginning on October 1 of the following year. In order to receive any apportionment for the fiscal year concerned, the Governor of each State must submit to the Secretary a statewide listing of potential projects likely to be funded based on no less than 150 percent of such protental apportionment. The statewide listing shall be submitted not later than January 1 following the April 1 date of such notification by the Secretary. Such listing shall not indicate priorities. It shall be comprised of specific named projects, by county of location, with associated estimated dollar totals by county. The development of such county lists must incorporate ample opportunity for public participation in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d). The Secretary shall transmit by no later than February 1 a compilation of such annual lists for all States to the authorizing and appropriation committees of the United States House of Representatives and the United States Senate which have jurisdiction over the fund.

Any portion of such 5 percent not paid or obligated in such fiscal year whall be reapportioned in the same manner as provided in paragraph (4) of this subsection.".

(c) MATCHING REQUIREMENTS.—In the first sentence of section 6(c), change the period to a comma and add the following: "except as otherwise provided in this subsection and subsection (h). Payments to States may cover not more than 75 percent of the cost of acquisition of lands, waters, and interests therein which (1) are within the boundaries of units of the Wild and Scenic Rivers System or, (2) are within designated corridors of scenic or historic trail components of the National Trails System, or (3) have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as national historic landmarks or national natural landmarks.".

No such funds may be used by a private nonprofit organization for administrative expenses. In the case of the utilization of such funds for acquisition, the recipient organization shall itself hold, or shall convey in perpetuity in a timely manner, such interest as it may have to be appropriate recipient, as determined to be appropriate by the funds grantor, for public benefit. It is the intent of Congress that such grants received and utilized by private nonprofit organizations will result in a greater public benefit from such expenditure than would the utilization of those same funds by governmental entities. For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'private nonprofit organization' means an organization qualified for exemption from income taxes under section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 which includes among it purposes the conservation of open space or the providing of, or enhancement or protection of, outdoor recreation opportunities.".

Such plan shall address specific needs and priorities for land conservation and recreation development. Such plan shall be developed or revised by providing ample opportunity for public participation in accordance with the provisions of subsection (d). Following official adoption of such plan and through September 30, 1996, such county or other governmental entity may receive funds to cover not more than 60 percent of the cost of the acquisition of lands, waters or interests therein in accordance with the provisions of such officially adopted plan. Such corpus shall be permanently unavailable to appropriation or expenditure for any purpose and must be prudently invested.

That portion of the interest derived from the investment of Federal and State matching funds may be utilized by the State only for projects related to the purposes of the Land and Water Conservation Fund or the Urban Parks and Recreation Recovery Act, including the preservation in perpetuity of open space (including farmland and forest land) where such preservation is—

"(A) for the scenic enjoyment of the general public, or

"(B) pursuant to a clearly delineated Federal, State, or local governmental conservation policy, and will yield a significant public benefit. In selecting projects for funding under this subsection, the States are encouraged to pursue the preservation of open space within or near urban and suburban areas. No part of such interest may be used to satisfy any other matching funds requirement contained in this or any other Act. The Secretary shall promulgate regulations to govern the administration of the provisions of this subsection. Violation by a State recipient of any part of this subsection or of the governing regulations promulgated by the Secretary shall constitute reason for disqualification for any future receipt of matching funds provided pursuant to this subsection.

(3) MATCHING FUNDS REQUIREMENT.—Amounts made available under section 5 for State trusts shall be available to each State, only to the extent annually matched dollar for dollar with nonfederal funds. Amounts available to the States under section 5 for State trusts which are not so matched in any year shall remain permanently in the fund in accordance with section 3(b).".

SEC. 207. ALLOCATION OF MONEYS FOR FEDERAL PURPOSES.

Each agency priority list shall comprise a funding level of not less than 150 percent of the average of the 3 previous years' appropriations authorized under this Act, for such agency. Priorities shall be based on such factors as important or special attributes of the resource, threat to resource integrity, timely availability, owner hardship, cost escalation, public recreation use values and similar considerations. An explanation of the criteria utilized for the development of such list shall be included.".

"(c) Effective on the enactment of the American Heritage Trust Act of 1989, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the fund as is not required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments shall be in public debt securities with maturities suitable for the needs of such fund and bearing interest at rates determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration current market yields on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States of comparable maturities. The income of such investments shall be credited to, and form a part of, such fund.

Such corpus shall be permanently unavailable to appropriation or expenditure for any purpose and must be prudently invested. That portion of the interest derived from such investment of Federal and State matching funds may be utilized by the State only for projects similar to those for which Historic Preservation Fund moneys are eligible to be used. No part of any such interest may be used to satisfy any matching requirement under this or any other Act. The Secretary shall promulgate regulations to govern the administration of the provisions of this subsection. Violation by a State recipient of any part of this subsection or of the governing regulations promulgated by the Secretary shall constitute reason for disqualification for any future receipt of matching funds provided pursuant to this subsection. Any portion of the 10 percent made available in any fiscal year for purposes of this paragraph which is not used in that fiscal year for such purposes shall be available in subsequent fiscal years for purposes of assistance to States under this subsection.".

If additional moneys from the trust are thereafter expended on the same site or project, temporary signing shall be added to the permanent signing to indicate the amount and nature of the additional assistance. The Secretary of the Interior shall provide for the design of standardized signs and shall prescribe standards and guidelines for the application of such signing. Such standards and guidelines shall indicate those circumstances when the requirements of this section may be waived in whole or in part if the placing of signs would be inappropriate or would create a risk of harm to the site or the natural or cultural resources located on or within the site. Nothing in this section shall permit or require the placing of signs at any site where such placement would be prohibited or restricted by any other applicable law or regulations.

(b) DESIGN CONTEST.—The Secretary of the Interior shall provide for the conduct of, and shall conclude within 18 months of the date of enactment of this Act, a voluntary contest for children enrolled in elementary or secondary schools for the design of a symbol to represent the American Heritage Trust for use related to the signing provision of subsection (a). The Secretary shall establish guidelines for the broad participation by children throughout the nation. Following selection of the winning design the Secretary may make such modifications or refinements in the design as he deems appropriate for purposes of subsection (a). The Secretary of the Interior may utilize funds appropriated for Federal purposes from the Land and Water Conservation Fund for the conduct of such contest, and shall provide for appropriate recognition of, and awards for, the contest winner and runners-up. No Federal funds shall be available for direct monetary awards for the contest winner or runners-up.

SUMMARY OF THE AMERICAN HERITAGE TRUST ACT OF 1989

Creates a new umbrella mechanism to embrace the continued operation of the Land and Water Conservation Fund (LWCF) and the Historic Preservation Fund (HPF).

New American Heritage Trust will automatically receive the unappropriated balance of LWCF ($6 billion) and HPF ($1 billion) and, on an annual basis, any of the $1.05 billion in OCS revenues that are not appropriated to LWCF or HPF (in recent years, LWCF appropriations from the $900 million annual authorization have averaged less than $200 million per year and HPF appropriations have averaged approx. $25 million of the $150 million annual authorization).

Flow of OCS revenues (other than revenues needed to offset inflation) will cease when balance of LWCF reaches 3.5 times current balance (the amount needed to produce approx. $1 billion per year in interest i.e. approx. $24 billion if earning 5% interest) and when balance of HPF reaches 5 times current balance (i.e. approx. $5 billion yielding $250 million per year in interest if earning 5% interest).

Trust fund to be invested in interest bearing government securities, interest earned to be appropriated automatically with Congressional control over federal projects and 20% of LWCF.

LWCF appropriations: currently averaging less than $200 million; goal is to produce $1 billion per year; during build-up of corpus, in addition to regular appropriations, automatic appropriation of interest earned may be as much as $500 million in year 1 (1990), $600 million in year 2 ('91), $700 million in year 3 ('92), $800 million in year 4 ('93), $900 million in year 5 ('94), and $1 billion in year 6 and after ('95). Actual amount will depend on interest rates and amount of regular appropriations.

HPF appropriations: currently averaging approx. $25 million; in addition to regular appropriations, automatic appropriation of interest earned in year one (assuming 5% interest) will be $50 million, escalating as corpus grows to a level of $250 million per year. Actual amount will depend on interest rates and amount of regular appropriations.

Allocation of LWCF moneys: at least 30% federal, 30% State grants (with 50% pass through to local governments and nonprofits), 10% to Urban Parks and Recreation Act, and for 10 years, 10% for State legislatively created trust funds modeled after this one.

State allocation of LWCF moneys: uses current formula with approx. 30% equally divided and balance distributed on basis of population and need, with cap of no more than 10% going to any one state; continues current 50/50 match requirement, allows 75 federal/25 state match for acquisition of nationally significant areas, authorizes for 3 years a 50/50 match for local planning and, for 8 years, 60 federal/40 state-local match for acquisition in accordance with local plans.

Allocation of HPF moneys: all except small % of funds go to State grants on basis of need, there is no formula. SAVING AMERICA'S HERITAGE

H.R. 4127, S. 2199 AND THE FUTURE OF THE CONSERVATION FUNDS

A quarter century ago, growing concerns about the loss of America's natural and historic heritage, increasing recreation demand, rapid population change and burgeoning urban development led Congress to create two of the nation's most far-sighted and successful environmental programs:

1. The Land and Water Conservation Fund (LWCF) was intended to provide a predictable and steady source of monies for critical acquisitions in national parks, forests, recreation and wildlife areas, and matching grants to states and localities for recreation planning acquisition and development and protection of open space.

2. The Historic Preservation Fund (HPF), created a few years later on the LWCF model and was to help states and communities identify, plan for, protect and restore unique historic resources.

REINVESTING OUR NATURAL CAPITAL: PROMISE AND PERFORMANCE

One of the Fund's most innovative features was the idea of reinvesting some of the returns from liquidation of America's natural resources into long-term capital assets. The laws provide that most appropriations for the two Funds should come from receipts from Outer Continental Shelf Oil and gas leasing and from sales of surplus federal real estate. This process blends the best features of fiscal and natural resources stewardship, joining the investment principle of "never consuming capital" with the conservation ethic of always returning to the land something of what we remove. The Land and Water Conservation Fund now automatically receives up to $900 million a year in such revenues and the Historic Preservation Fund receives $150 million a year. Under current law, however, these commitments are more a promise to present and future generations than a working reality.

Through the 1970's, there was firm, bipartisan support for that promise; appropriations varied from year to year, but the long-term commitment to appropriate all authorized funds continued. Since 1980, that commitment has seriously deterioriated. LWCF appropriations have declined from an annual peak of $805 million to an average of less than $20 million a year; funding for the eight most recent years totals less than 90 percent of the total for the three years, 1978-1980.

HPF grant appropriations have averaged under $30 million a year; substantial funding for physical restoration of historic sites has been available only once in this decade. As a result, authorized but unappropriated "credits" to LWCF and HPF have increased twenty-fold, from just over $300 million to more than $7 billion, and federal, state and local agencies that once planned to reinvest the larger amounts now doubt that the promise will ever be fulfilled.

WHAT WILL H.R. 4127 AND S. 2199 DO?

In March, Representative Morris Udall, a key sponsor of original LWCF and HPF legislation, introduced H.R. 4127, a bill to restore the promise of these programs. Subsequently, Senators Chafee, Baucus, Fowler and Graham introduced S. 2199, an identical Senate bill. The American Heritage Trust Act would not increase authorized funding levels. Rather, it would create a better funding mechanism that would ensure, over several years, a return to the original funding commitments by creating a self-perpetuating Trust. The AHT Act will:

Create permanent Trust accounts for LWCF and HPF with principals that cannot be used for other purposes.

Require the Secretary of the Treasury to invest all authorized but unappropriated balances to date for the LWCF and HPF into interest-bearing public debt securities. The $900 million per year in revenues deposited annually into LWCF and the $150 million into HPF would be invested in the same way.

Annual deposits and interest for both Funds would be available for appropriation in the following fiscal year. Any amounts not appropriated in a given year would automatically become a permanent part of the interest-bearing Trust principal.

Annual LWCF appropriations would be distributed as follows: at least 30 percent for state and local acquisitions; 10 percent for special matching monies to serve as principal for states to establish parallel heritage trusts; and 10 percent for the purposes of the Urban Park and Recreation Recovery Act. The remaining 20 percent could be used for any of these four purposes. Ten percent of HPF appropriations would also be devoted to helping establish state historic preservation trusts.

To encourage volunteer contributions, five percent of each state's LWCF grants would have to be partially matched by private or non-profit donations. Qualified, private-nonprofit groups like local land trusts would also be eligible for grants under certain conditions.

A 75 percent match would be available from LWCF for state or local land acquisitions involving nationally recognized wild or scenic rivers, trails or landmarks.

LWCF matching grants would be available for three years to help counties and other localities prepare land conservation and recreation plans. High priority land acquisitions identified in such plans could receive a 60 percent match for an eight-year period.

Federal land agencies would have to submit lists of priority lands for LWCF acquisition of Congress each year. States would submit yearly lists of grant proposals based on current state and local action lists and their likely annual shares of LWCF appropriations.

The growth of the Funds would be capped at four times (for LWCF) and five times (for HPF) the balances existing on the date of enactment of the American Heritage Trust. After that, the Funds would be self-sustaining. Appropriations would be from interest only and Trust principal would grow annually only by amounts sufficient to offset inflation.

HOW CAN A TRUST FUND BE JUSTIFIED?

By any measure, the Fund programs have been enormously successful. Some accomplishments:

A recently-published, county-by-county list of local, state and federal LWCF projects fills 466 pages!

These projects have helped to acquire 5.5 millions acres of recreation and park lands, including seashores, lakeshores, critical habitats, scenic rivers and trails.

Fund grant programs have helped all states to establish their own historic preservation and recreation plans, to identify and protect key natural, historic and archeological resources and to expand state park, forest, wildlife refuge, river and trial systems.

LWCF grants have helped develop almost 20,000 local park facilities to meet demands for close-to-home recreation opportunities.

HPF grants have helped state to identify and profect historic and archeological resources and to restore over 6,000 historic sites.

The "federal side of the LWCF financed expansion of the national parks from an almost exclusively western domain to a truly national system. It converted inaccessible inholdings in may eastern national forests to major recreation areas and acquired thousands of acres of endrangered species habit.

LWCF and HPF matching grants of 50 percents prompted localities and states for double the federal investment to a total of almost $7 billion.

Beyond these matching amounts, the example of federal commitments encouraged more than half the states and thousands of communities to invest billions more in recreation, natural and historic resources.

ARE THESE PROGRAMS STILL NECESSARY?

If the problems that prompted the establishment of LWCF and HPF had been mostly solved, further commitments would be unneccessary. Unfortunately those problems have not gone away. Despite the substantial accomplishments of the Funds, needs for capital investment in recreation, conservation and historic preservation are greater than ever.

Loss of key natural and historic resources continues at an alarming pace. After some slowdowns in the early 1980's a new boom in urban and rural development is underway. It is consuming almost 500,000 acres of wetlands yearly, along with 750,000 acres of farm and forest.

The Surgeon General calls for development of more public recreation facilities to promote fitness activities and reduce health costs that now equal 11 percent of our Gross National Product. The list of lost historic and archeological resources grows longer each year. Older parks in many states and communities have deteriorated landscapes and facilities that need major repair or replacement.

We have a better idea now than 25 years ago of what opportunities are lacking and what resources need protection. But the prices of land, facility development and restoration have also risen, and lack of money continues to be the major barrier to doing what we know should be done. The National Park Service alone reports a current backlog of $2 billion in authorized land purchases within park boundaries. For the last five years, states have reported applications averaging more than $400 million a year for LWCF grants. Ignoring these needs will not make them go away. Delaying action will mean the permanent loss of irreplaceable resources and increased costs in the future. We must invest now in these appreciating capital assets.

COSPONSORSHIP OF THE "AMERICAN HERITAGE TRUST ACT OF 1989"

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I am pleased to have joined my distinguished colleague from Rhode Island, Senator CHAFEE, as an original cosponsor of the American Heritage Trust Act of 1989. The land and water conservation fund has not met the needs of public land acquisition to date. It has become evident that a new means of assuring funding is imperative to even begin chipping away at their long list of priority lands that necessitate and deserve public acquisition.

The beauty of the American Heritage Trust Fund fashioned by Senator CHAFEE is that it is permanent, and interest accrued on the fund would be available without further appropriation. In recent years, the administration has continually requested minute amounts to be appropriated from the land and water conservation fund in its annual budget submitted to Congress. Congress has responded by appropriating more than requested, but not nearly enough to protect our environmentally sensitive and historically significant lands.

There currently exists a long list of priority lands awaiting acquisition under the land and water conservation fund. The estimated cost of these lands at today's value comes to $825 million. In fiscal year 1986, a total of $4.6 million was available in the fund. However, a mere $168,000 was appropriated from the fund for land acquisition.

We in Florida have several priority acquisitions on the list, including the Key Deer Wildlife Refuge and Fakahatchee Strand, among others. Most of these priority lands are habitat for endangered species, such as the Florida panther, key deer, crocodile, and the whooping crane—to name a few.

In an effort to illustrate the numerous worthy projects that have been funded in my State alone through the land and water conservation fund, I am submitting for the record a list of Florida lands that have been acquired through 1987. Other States' lists are similarly impressive, and I ask unanimous consent that the list be printed in the RECORD.

We are not advocating frivolous public acquisition of land. Instead, we are recognizing the real need to protect—and provide buffers around—environmentally sensitive and historically significant tracts. We are referring to habitat protection, to preservation of species, to preservation of history, to protection and often restoration of ecological systems, to conservation of open space, and to provision of recreational areas.

Our work is far from complete. This bill offers us a chance to continue bringing sensitive historic and recreational land into the public system for preservation, protection and enjoyment for generations to come. A trust fund exists; we are merely working to make the trust fund available for the purposes intended, while retaining a corpus which can be used to offset the deficit.

I encourage my colleagues' support in cosponsoring and ultimately approving this worthy legislation. I commend my colleague from Rhode Island for his efforts in developing this excellent piece of work.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. McCLURE:

S. 371. A bill to designate certain National Forest System lands in the State of Idaho for inclusion in the National Wilderness Preservation System, to prescribe certain management formulas for certain National Forest System lands, and to release other forest lands for multiple-use management, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

IDAHO FOREST MANAGEMENT ACT

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing a bill that I believe is the only possible legislative solution to Idaho's wilderness question, an issue that must be resolved to provide a blueprint that will ensure the wise use of Idaho's national forests during the next decade and onward into the 21st century.

This is a bill born of conciliation, not conflict. Gov. Cecil Andrus and I took what has been our State's most contentious political question for the past 25 years and forged a compromise among conflicting interests in a way we both believe will resolve the issue for Idaho as well as for the rest of the Nation.

We in Idaho are proud of the natural beauty of our national forests. So is the rest of the country; we know that. It is because of our respect for our lands that we take a great deal of interest in seeing them protected while using them wisely—the true definition of conservation.

Citizens of Idaho, as well as those from other parts of our country, use them for hunting, fishing, backpacking, and hiking. At the same time, some areas are logged to produce wood to construct the homes we live in and for making paper used in producing the books we read. Some land is preserved in its pristine state as wilderness while some is mined for the minerals and metals we use in making automobiles, TV's, and cookware. Still other land is set aside for nonmotorized users wanting to escape the noise of urban areas, while some is leased for grazing to help provide the red meat demanded at the local grocery store.

We in Idaho are fortunate, indeed, in having vast areas that are relatively untouched by man, and we are proud that we have been able to make large contributions to our Nation's wilderness system. Four million acres of Idaho's national forests have already been set aside as wilderness. That's a land mass larger than Connecticut and Rhode Island combined. Out of all the lower 48 States, only California has more designated wilderness than Idaho.

Now, the Governor and I are suggesting significant additions to Idaho's wilderness system. But our bill is more than just a wilderness bill. In order to settle the wilderness question, it has been necessary to provide a blueprint that will allow for the responsible stewardship of Idaho national forests into the next decade and beyond. The plan we offer will preserve an additional large portion of Idaho's national forests as wilderness, and at the same time protect Idaho jobs that other proposals would destroy.

We propose classifying an additional 1.4 million acres of Idaho's national forests as wilderness. Another 650,000 acres will be protected by statutory management, less prescriptive than wilderness designation, but more prescriptive than management under existing law. The addition of the acreage we propose to existing wilderness will bring the total figure to some 5½ million acres—27 percent of all the national forest land in Idaho. The areas we propose to classify are unique and truly deserving of protection as wilderness. Governor Andrus and I believe this proposal is a fair compromise between environmentalists and natural resource-based industries, between backpackers and motorized recreationists, and between outfitters and guides and wilderness purists.

After introducing our bill in the last Congress, we conducted hearings in both Idaho and Washington. Frankly, we found little support for the bill from those who testified or, for that matter, from the rest of the Idaho delegation. However, given the inability of those involved to work out any sort of final solution since the Wilderness Act was passed 25 years ago, such a reaction was not surprising. Instead of moving toward reconciliation of viewpoint, there has been increasing polarization of special interest groups.

A "yes" vote on our compromise will add the equivalent of two additional Rhode Islands to our country's wilderness system. Passage of this bill will also ease the anxiety of the thousands of people in my State who look toward the national forests for their livelihood and nonwilderness recreation.

In all honesty, the bill is not exactly what either Governor Andrus or myself would have produced given the opportunity to craft bills independently. But in the interests of Idahoans and those all over this country who have an interest in our forests, we have found common ground.

Many of you will recall the story of King Solomon and the two women. Each claimed to be the mother of a young child and asked King Solomon to decide who would be granted custody. Those of you who know the story remember that King Solomon decided to cut the child in half giving each woman an equal share. But in the nick of time, the real mother pleaded with the King not to kill the child. Her love was greater than her desire to keep the child from the impostor.

The wilderness issue in Idaho has created a similar situation for us. Because of the emotion involved and the inability of polarized interest groups in resolving the problem, they have come to the Congress year after year seeking an answer. Proposals have tugged first one way, then another. We are now at a point where Congress is being asked to play king as a result of the "no further compromise" attitude of both sides of the issue.

The Governor and I have attempted to put away our own differences in order to do what is right for Idaho. The same cannot be said of some of the interest groups involved in this debate.

Much of the opposition to our bill comes from people who would rather achieve political victory than find a meaningful and workable compromise. Rather than yield to that kind of opposition, the Governor and I have decided to move forward with what we believe gives all sides more than they will get without our bill.

The alternative to the compromise we offer is to delegate management of our public lands to the Federal courts. Such a delegation of responsibility will only result in wasted time, energy, resources, frustration, and disappointment.

Because the management of our national forests is such a divisive issue in Idaho, if there is ever going to be a compromise on the issue, this is probably the best we can do. Both Governor Andrus and I have moved from our traditional position on this issue to a point of common ground in an attempt to end the divisiveness. Both of us have disappointed some of our traditional supporters.

We have done our best, and we now ask Congress to help us resolve the issue for both our State and the Nation. I sincerely hope the Congress will not turn its back just because both the issue and the solution are tough. A decision must be made. I hope my colleagues will join me in supporting a truly bipartisan attempt to solve a tremendous problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following editorial from the Idaho Statesman of October 25, 1988, titled "Try Again on Wilderness Bill," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRY AGAIN ON WILDERNESS BILL

The 100th Congress is history. So is the Idaho wilderness bill—at least for this session of Congress.

But Idaho Sen. Jim McClure and Gov. Cecil Andrus shouldn't give up the fight to resolve the Idaho wilderness issue.

For encouragement, Gov. Andrus and Sen. McClure should look at the success Oregon and Montana had during the last Congress in resolving two strictly natural resource issues.

And they can also look at the successful passage of legislation to create the City of Rocks National Reserve and the Hagerman Fossils National Monument. Both of these issues had been controversial for many years.

In Oregon, Congress added parts of 40 streams—or more than 1,400 miles—to the state's Wild and Scenic Rivers System. The legislation received the support of every Oregon legislator save one, regardless of whether they were Republican or Democrat.

Oregon Sen. Mark Hatfield, who proposed the legislation just 10 months ago, said that "few legislative victories have meant as much for the future of Oregon." In an editorial, The Oregonian newspaper compared the Wild and Scenic Rivers legislation to the proposal 75 years ago by Oregon Gov. Oswald West to keep the state's ocean beaches in public ownership.

In Montana, Congress designated another 1.43 million acres as wilderness, left restrictions on another 680,000 acres and freed up about 4 million acres for multiple uses.

Gov. Andrus and Sen. McClure have proposed a blueprint for how Idaho can come close to resolving the wilderness issue. It is now up to those two leaders, the state's other political leaders and the various interest groups to build upon that blueprint.

Environmentalists and natural resource industry leaders showed this year that they could work together when they reached agreement on water-quality standards. The same effort should be used to find common ground on the wilderness issue.

The 101st Congress, which convenes next year, marks a fresh opportunity for these diverse players to get together and support a compromise Idaho wilderness bill.

Mr. BENTSEN (for himself and Mr. GRAHAM):

S. 372. A bill to amend title V of the Refugee Education Assistance Act of 1980 to provide certain resettlement assistance for certain Central Americans; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ASSISTANCE FOR CERTAIN CENTRAL AMERICANS

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, as you may be aware, over the last year there has been a huge—130 percent—increase in the number of asylum applications filed with the Immigration and Naturalization Service. Applications jumped from 26,107 in fiscal year 1987 to 60,736 in fiscal year 1988.

Eighty-two percent of the applicants came from just three countries: El Salvador, Nicaragua, and Guatemala.

Since most Central Americans enter the United States through south Texas, that economically depressed area of my State has been particularly hard-hit by the boom in asylum applications. The influx of immigrants has created a tremendous strain on this community as it attempts to provide basic humanitarian assistance to the immigrants.

The problems facing south Texas were compounded in mid-December when INS announced a change in policy that effectively confined the Central American asylum applicants to the Brownsville/Harlingen area in south Texas. We quickly had a crisis situation on our hands down there, with shelters filled to capacity and immigrants sleeping in the woods, in tent cities, and in abandoned motels.

In effect, the INS had turned the entire Brownsville/Harlingen area into a massive detention camp.

Mr. President, I recognize the need for INS to act in the face of the recent boom in asylum applications. We must preserve the integrity of our borders and our immigration laws. But the policy adopted by the INS—which essentially dumps this problem into the lap of the people of south Texas—is simply intolerable.

South Texas is an area of high unemployment and low per capita income. It is an area where the ability of schools to educate young people was already strained by Federal immigration policies long before the INS announced its latest policy change. It is an area where health problems are more severe and health care is less available than in other parts of Texas and the Nation.

In short, it is an area lacking in the resources needed to cope with an immigration boom, and it is vastly unreasonable for the INS to adopt a policy that effectively confines thousands of destitute immigrants to this area.

The outrageousness of this policy is heightened by the fact that the INS has turned a deaf ear to the cries from the local community for financial assistance, essentially taking a "that's not my problem" approach. Mr. President, we simply must provide some assistance to south Texas and other areas heavily impacted by the boom in Central American immigrants. There is no getting around the fact that this is a Federal responsibility.

Today, I am introducing legislation that will provide for Federal assistance to south Texas and other heavily impacted areas, and will do so on an expeditious basis. My bill will authorize the Community Relations Service, a division of the Justice Department, to respond and provide assistance to the communities hardest hit by this boom in Central American immigration.

I understand that the Community Relations Service currently has approximately $20 million available, which could be used to help areas like south Texas. However, under current law, the Community Relations Service is authorized to respond only where Cuban or Haitian immigrants or unaccompanied minor immigrants are involved.

My legislation simply expands the authority of the Community Relations Service to also authorize it to respond where Central American immigrants are involved. Since the Community Relations Service has funds available, it could respond quickly to the needs in south Texas and elsewhere relating to this immigration influx.

I realize that there may be a need to reimburse the Cuban-Haitian fund at the Community Relations Service, perhaps through supplemental appropriations, when the funds they currently have on hand are used to respond to Central American immigrants. I am sensitive to that, but believe that we must provide assistance and provide it quickly to south Texas and other areas hard hit by the large number of Central American immigrants. Expanding the authority of the Community Relations Service is the way to accomplish that.

Mr. President, as I have suggested above, south Texas is not the only part of this country that has been greatly impacted by the recent increase in immigration from Central America. Miami and Los Angeles have also been greatly affected, and the local governments and community agencies in those cities are also in need of Federal assistance.

I am pleased to be joined in introducing this legislation by my colleague from Florida, Senator GRAHAM, and my colleague from Texas, Senator GRAMM. I urge the rest of my colleagues to support this important and needed legislation as well.

I am also joined in this effort by one of my Texas colleagues in the House, Representative SOLOMON ORTIZ, and I am hopeful that we can push this legislation through both Houses quickly to provide some desperately needed assistance to south Texas and the other impacted areas. If we do not, we are shirking what is clearly a Federal responsibility.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the legislation be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the bill and statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 372

(d) The title heading for title V of such Act is amended to read as follows:

"TITLE V—SUPPLEMENTAL RESETTLEMENT ASSISTANCE FOR CUBAN AND HAITIAN ENTRANTS AND CENTRAL AMERICA ENTRANTS"

Mr. GRAHAM. Madam President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague, Senator BENTSEN, in proposing a reasoned solution to the replication of an old problem.
